to, and engage some of them to make an estimate on the said hotel, among whom was the firm of Ketchum & De Noille. The evidence on the part of plaintiffs is to the effect that, when said agent named said builders, Mr. Lounds, one of the assured, said to the agent: "Before we go further in this matter, is it understood that estimates furnished by either of these firms will be satisfactory to you?" to which the agent replied: "Yes, certainly; we have done business with all three of them." On the part of defendant said agent testifies to the effect that he does not think Mr. Lounds asked such a question; that most of his conversation was with Mr. Flowers, that Mr. Flowers asked "a similar question" to which said agent replied that "the builders named were all reliable men, and had made estimates for us before on buildings." The assured then engaged Ketchum & De Noille, one of the firms of builders named by said agent, to make an estimate of said hotel building. Such estimate was made from details and specifications furnished by assured, and was designated as "an estimate of the cost of replacing the hotel building at Moreland." Said estimate was delivered to defendant's agent; and said agent, not being satisfied therewith, required of said builders a more detailed estimate, which was furnished. Said builders took no account of and made no estimate upon the furniture destroyed in said hotel. It appears by the testimony of De Noille that the estimate of said building was made principally by Ketchum, and that it was not understood by said builders that they were to act as arbitrators, and he did not understand that they acted as such. It does not appear that any "umpire" was chosen, and the record shows that said estimate was not returned "on oath." At the time said estimate was being made by said builders the assured had prepared what they termed "proofs of loss," and the same was served on said agent. It appears that one proof of loss was made for each company having a policy in force on said property, and the four were delivered to said agent in one package. Upon examining one of said papers defendant's agent found that it contained a "clause referring to the loss of the building, as estimated by Ketchum & De Noille & Co., builders, selected by agreement between the agent of the company and assured to make estimates." Thereupon the agent returned all of said proofs of loss to the attorney who had delivered them for the assured. The next day said agent explained to said attorney his objection to said proofs of loss, which was that said proofs contained said clause in reference to Ketchum & De Noille having been "agreed upon." That appears to have been the only objection to said proofs asserted. Defendant's agent insisted that said clause should be stricken out, and assured refused to strike the same out.

The foregoing facts were proved without any essential conflict, and are taken principally from testimony introduced on behalf of defendant. There is a dispute between the parties to the action as to an arrangement made between the attorney of plaintiffs, who delivered said proofs of loss, and defendant's agent, whereby the same were retained by said attorney with the understanding that such proofs were to be considered as not having been delivered to defendant's agent. The evidence is conflicting upon that point, therefore it is not open for any consideration now. Counsel for appellant contends that defendant would have been prejudiced and injured by the retention of said proof of loss with said objectionable clause therein; that it was justified in returning the same to assured; that the refusal of assured to strike out said objectionable clause and return said proofs was a failure to make proof of loss, as required by the policy. Appellant construes said clause as an attempt on the part of the assured to involve defendant in an implied admission of a material statement of fact which in truth never occurred, and which statement was false. We do not gather such impression from the evidence. The evidence introduced on the part of defendant alone shows a state of facts from which the assured could in good faith have presumed that Ketchum & De Noille were chosen by agreement to make the required estimates on said hotel building, although they were not chosen as appraisers in the manner provided by the policy; nor did they proceed to make appraisal and return award strictly in the manner provided by the policy. The proof of loss in question, as shown by the record, contained no statement to the effect that Ketchum & De Noille were chosen as arbitrators or appraisers by agreement between the company and the assured, or that they made or pretended to make an appraisal or award, as required by the policy. The proof contains the following statement: "Loss on building, as estimated by Ketchum, De Noille & Co., builders, selected by agreement between agent of Cos. and assured." Under the circumstances of the selection of said builders and the making of an estimate by them we see no evidence of fraud, trick, or deceit in the insertion of that statement in the proof of loss. Moreover, had said statement been absolutely false in fact, we do not agree with the proposition of defendant's counsel, that the retaining of said proofs of loss would have bound defendant by an implied admission of the truth of such statement, under the circumstances shown in the case. No such implied admission could arise against defendant by merely retaining such paper after denouncing such objectionable statement as untrue, and demanding its elimination from said proof.

We return to the main question raised upon this appeal, i. e. that "plaintiffs must recover on an award by arbitrators or appraisers, if at all." The question as to how far courts will be governed by a provision in a contract requiring that controversies arising as to the rights and liabilities of parties thereunder be submitted to arbitration has engaged the profound consideration of both American and English courts of last resort. The conclusion reached, and probably settled beyond further controversy, is that a provision in a contract requiring all differences or con-controversies arising between the parties as to their rights and liabilities thereunder to be submitted to arbitration, will not be allowed to interfere with or bar the litigation of such controversies when brought into court. To enforce such provisions would be to allow parties to barter away the jurisdiction of courts to determine the rights of parties and redress their wrongs. Therefore such provision is disregarded, as against public policy. But many of the same eminent authorities hold that a provision in a contract requiring that the value or quantity of a thing which might be involved in a controversy thereunder be ascertained and determined by arbitration, or in some other possible and reasonable manner, does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts, but only requires a certain character of evidence of a fact in controversy. Therefore a provision in a contract like the one under consideration in the case at bar, requiring that the value of the assured property, under certain conditions, shall be ascertained by appraisal, is not disregarded as against public policy, but is upheld as valid. Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. Cas. 811; Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 945; U. S. v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 325; Insurance Co. v. Clancy, 71 Tex. 5, 8 S. W. Rep. 630; Wolff v. Insurance Co., 50 N. J. Law, 453, 14 Atl. Rep. 561; Gasser v. Sun Fire Office, 42 Minn. 315, 44 N. W. Rep. 252; Old Saucelito L. & D. D. Co. v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., 66 Cal. 253, 5 Pac. Rep. 232; Sutro Tunnel Co. v. Segregated Belcher Min. Co., (Nev.) 7 Pac. Rep. 271; Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307. The policy in the case at bar requires that, if the parties fail to agree upon the amount of damage, "the same shall then, at the written request of either party, be ascertained by an appraisal" by "competent and impartial appraisers," one to be selected by each party, and the two to select an umpire, etc. It is insisted by counsel for appellant that said clause, viewed in connection with the other provisions of the policy, and especially the clause that provides that "until such proofs as above required are produced, and examinations and appraisals are permitted, the loss shall not be payable," makes it obligatory upon the assured in this action to prove the amount of loss or damage by an appraisal obtained in the manner required by the policy, or show a fair endeavor and failure without plaintiff's fault to get such an appraisal; otherwise plaintiffs' suit in court is premature, and must fail. This is claimed by defendant's counsel to be an imperative requirement of the plaintiffs, whether defendant requests such appraisal or not. There is no showing that either party requested such an appraisal. The defendant, by answer, expressly denies that it "made a request of plaintiffs that the value of said building be ascertained by arbitrators to be mutually chosen, or to be chosen in any other manner." The plaintiffs alleged in their complaint "that no demand has been made by the defendant for a further or any other reference of said loss on building or furniture or fixtures since said proofs of loss were so furnished." This allegation is not denied.

In support of their position counsel for defendant cites certain authorities, which we will now briefly review. In the case of Old Saucelito L. & D. D. Co. v. Commercial Union Assur. Co., supra, it appears from the opinion of the court that the complaint stated "facts showing that a difference arose as to the amount of loss;" "that plaintiff thereupon, and on request of defendant, chose" arbitrators, to whom was submitted "all differences of opinion as to the amount of said loss." The plaintiff further averred that the arbitrators so selected failed to agree on the amount of loss or damage, and failed to select a third person to act with them in case of disagreement, and also failed to make an award; and the plaintiff, after waiting a reasonable time, withdrew from such arbitration. But the court found on the trial that no arbitrators were chosen, and no differences as to the amount of damages were submitted to arbitrators, "and that the failure to submit such differences of opinion to arbitration was in no manner the fault or result of any action suffered or taken by defendant, but, on the contrary, defendant had always been willing to submit such differences." Upon that state of facts and the authorities it was held that plaintiff could not recover. It should be remembered that in this case the complaint alleged that differences arose as to the amount of the loss, and that defendant demanded arbitration. In the case of Adams v. Insurance Cos., 70 Cal. 198, 11 Pac. Rep. 627, it appears that differences arose between the companies and the assured as to the amount of loss, and no demand was made by either party for an arbitration, as provided in the policies. The court, referring to the case reported in 66 Cal., supra, held that until adjustment of the claim by mutual agreement or by arbitration, or a fair effort was made by the assured to obtain such arbitration, no action could be maintained. In the case of Carroll v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 299, 13 Pac. Rep. 863, it appears that an arbitration was required by the policy to determine the amount of loss in case of differences as to the same, and that such arbitration was had; but when the plaintiff brought suit he declared upon the policy generally, ignoring the award, and made no mention of the fact that an award had been obtained. It was held that the award was a necessary element of plaintiff's cause of action. The facts involved in these California cases distinguish them from the case at bar, but in the main appellant's position is supported by them. The case of Lovejoy v. Insurance Co., 11 Fed. Rep. 63, (U. S. C. C.) is also cited by appellant's counsel. But that was an action by creditors of the assured to enforce payment of the loss to them. It was found that no preliminary proofs of loss had been made, as required by the policies. Nor was there satisfactory evidence of waiver of such proofs. So it was held by Judge BLODGETT that the claims were not in such condition that the assured could maintain an action thereon; and, of course, it followed that creditors of assured could not compel payment of these claims by garnishment process. In his opinion the learned judge, after finding that the preliminary proofs had neither been made nor waived, also mentions the provision in some of the policies before him, requiring the amount of the loss or damage to be fixed by arbitration in case of dispute, and remarks that he has no doubt that courts will enforce the provision in the future as in the past. It is plain that in this case the decision did not turn upon the question as to whether the amount of loss had been fixed by arbitration, because no preliminary proofs had been made, as required by the policies, so as to reach the question of difference as to the amount of loss. The case of U. S. v. Robeson, supra, is also cited by appellant. This case affirms the general rule that, where a contract provides that a certain fact—as that the transportation of certain additional freight over and above a certain quantity shall be paid for at a given rate, on producing the certificate of the commanding officer, showing the quantity of such additional freight transported—such fact must be proved by the kind of evidence required by the terms of the contract, or the party seeking to recover must show that he has made all reasonable effort to obtain such proof before he can be allowed to introduce other evidence of such fact. In such a case the contract does not contemplate that anything is to be done by the person obligated to pay, except to await the certificate of the party previously designated by both parties to ascertain and certify the quantity. The contract does not contemplate that the paying party shall do anything towards obtaining such certificate; nor is there any alternative contemplated whereby the parties may, under certain circumstances, dispense altogether with the necessity for such certificate; nor that it shall only be required in case of "differences" of opinion as to the amount in question, and then can only be brought into existence by the joint action of both parties in selecting arbitrators to ascertain the value, as in the case at bar. As remarked in the case last cited, supra: "The principles involved * * * are connected with the fiscal action of the government." If the paying agent of the government disbursed money on certificates or evidence other than such as the contract provided for, he did so at his own risk, for he was required to produce such certificates as the contract called for in accounting for his disbursements. Appellant's counsel cite, as sustaining their position upon the point under consideration, Flaherty v. Insurance Co., 7 Ins. Law J. 226, (Pa. 1878.) We have not been able to examine this case, as the report cited is not at hand. Nor do we find such case in the Pennsylvania State Reports. But the holding of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, as announced by Mr. Justice SHARSWOOD in Mentz v. Insurance Co., 79 Pa. St. 478, appears to be opposed to appellant's position. In that case it appears that the policy in question contained a provision for arbitration of differences as to the amount of loss, and that no action should be maintained on the policy unless the amount of loss "shall be first thus ascertained." "The defendants moved for a nonsuit, 'because section 8 requires the parties to the policy to submit to a reference,' etc. Plaintiff objected to the motion because no reference was offered or asked for. By direction of the court judgment of nonsuit was entered. This was assigned for error on the removal of the record to the supreme court by plaintiff by writ of error." The judgment was reversed. In the case of Hamilton v. Insurance Co., supra, it appears there was contention as to "whether defendant had duly requested and plaintiff had unreasonably refused to submit to such an appraisal and award as the policy called for." But it is remarked by Mr. Justice GRAY, in delivering the opinion of the court, that the evidence upon that question does not depend in any degree "on oral testimony or extrinsic facts, but wholly upon the construction of the correspondence in writing between the parties. * * * That correspondence clearly shows that the defendant repeatedly and explicitly in writing requested that the amount of the loss or damage should be submitted to appraisers in accordance with the terms of the policy; and that plaintiff as often peremptorily refused to do this, unless defendant would consent in advance to define the legal powers and duties of the appraisers, (which defendant was under no legal obligation to do.)" It was held that "the court rightly instructed the jury that the defendant had requested in writing, and the plaintiff had declined, the appraisal provided for in the policy, and that plaintiff, therefore, could not maintain this action." So in the case of Gasser v. Sun Fire Office, supra, differences arose as to the amount of loss, and "the defendant duly and seasonably made a written request of said plaintiff that the amount of such damage be ascertained by an appraisal, according to the terms of the contract, and demanded that the plaintiff select and name an appraiser to act for him; and that plaintiff wholly neglected and refused to comply with such request, or to enter upon any appraisal." Under such a state of facts it was held that plaintiff must comply with defendant's request for appraisement before action could be maintained for recovery of the loss. In the recent case of Insurance Co. v. Pulver, 126 Ill. 329, 18 N. E. Rep. 804, the usual arbitration clause was under consideration. Mr. Justice BAILEY, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The instructions given enumerate, among the defenses of which the defendant was seeking to avail itself, the failure of plaintiff to submit her differences with the defendant in respect to her loss or damage to arbitration in accordance with the conditions of the policy; and on that question the jury were instructed as follows: 'As to the question of arbitration you are instructed that under the provisions of the policy, if there was a dispute as to the amount of loss, then either party could demand an arbitration to determine the amount of such loss, by serving a notice in writing on the opposite party; and before you can find against the plaintiff on this point you must believe from the evidence that there was a dispute between the parties as to the amount of the loss, and that notice in writing was served on her, or some one authorized to act for her, demanding such arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the policy, and that she, in person or by attorney, without sufficient cause, refused to submit to such arbitration.' It is insisted that this instruction, though holding the law substantially in accordance with the defendant's theory, is erroneous in not conforming in its hypothesis to the evidence as it was actually given,—the evidence being, as is claimed, in accordance with the hypothesis of an instruction asked by the defendant." The court held that said instruction was not erroneous. In the case of Gere v. Insurance Co., 67 Iowa, 272, 23 N. W. Rep. 137, 25 N. W. Rep. 159, after suit was brought to recover the loss the insurance company demanded arbitration, under a clause in the policy providing therefor, and urged said clause and demand for arbitration as a defense. The suit was commenced five months after the loss occurred. It was held that demand for arbitration came too late, and plaintiff was allowed to proceed. In a comparatively recent case before the supreme court of Michigan, (Nurney v. Insurance Co., 63 Mich. 638, 30 N. W. Rep. 352,) it appears that differences had arisen between the parties as to the amount of loss. The policy in question contained an arbitration clause very much like the one in the case at bar; and, although such differences had existed, as to the amount of loss, for some five months prior to the suit, no request for arbitration had been made by either party. At the trial the defendant invoked the clause in the policy requiring arbitration, as well as another clause providing that no suit should be brought until after such arbitration was had. The trial court instructed the jury "that the plaintiff could not maintain his suit until the amount of his loss had first been determined by arbitration, or he had given notice to the defendant of his desire to have the same so determined, and the defendant had neglected or refused to comply with the request; and thereupon further instructed the jury to return their verdict for the defendant." On appeal this was held to be error, and the judgment was reversed. See other cases upon this subject: Gibbs v. Insurance Co., 13 Hun, 611; Mark v. Insurance Co., 24 Hun, 565, affirmed in New York court of appeals, 91 N. Y. 663; Hurst v. Litchfield, 39 N. Y. 377; Wallace v. Insurance Co., 1 McCrary, 335, 2 Fed. Rep. 658; Id., 4 McCrary, 123, 41 Fed. Rep. 742; Stephenson v. Insurance Co., 54 Me. 69; Wolff v. Insurance Co., supra; Insurance Co. v. Putnam, 20 Neb. 331, 30 N. W. Rep. 246; Insurance Co. v. Badger, 53 Wis. 283, 10 N. W. Rep. 504; Reed v. Insurance Co., 138 Mass. 572; Insurance Co. v. Steiger, 109 Ill. 254; Lasher v. Insurance Co., 55 How. Pr. 318; Crossley v. Insurance Co., 27 Fed. Rep. 30; Robinson v. Insurance Co., 17 Me. 131.

Without further reviewing authorities, we conclude from the number examined bearing upon this important subject that the tendency now is to construe the provision found in contracts like the one before us, providing for arbitration as to differences respecting the amount of loss or damage, to mean, in contemplation of the parties, that the party desiring arbitration shall request the same. In view of the numerous terms and conditions of the contract, and the position occupied by the parties, we believe this is the manifest intention. Under the terms of the policy, when a loss occurs, the time for payment is fixed. Notice and verified proofs of loss are required to be presented by the assured, with other conditions as to proofs and examinations, if the insurer request them. The proofs of loss certify under oath the amount of loss as claimed by the assured. The insurer may accept this estimate, or proceed to negotiate for an adjustment or a "mutual agreement" with the assured as to the amount he will take in satisfaction of the contract; or the insurer may give notice within the required time of intention to restore the property. All these alternatives for the insurer are provided in the policy, and it is contemplated that the assured must await the movements of the insurer upon some of these lines of action. The assured cannot know which will be adopted until notified by the insurer. The insurer may also, if a difference of opinion as to the fair amount of the loss is entertained, notify the assured thereof, and request arbitration. The insurer has the amount of loss claimed by assured, stated under oath; and the suggestion of "differences" in that respect must come from the insurer, and such differences ought to be certain, and would probably involve the admission of liability to pay a stated amount. (Lasher v. Insurance Co., 55 How. Pr. 318,) so that an issue would be stated to submit to arbitration. The insurer, under such a contract, is the only party who can effectually demand and bring about arbitration or gain a defense by reason of the other party's default in failing to comply therewith, but, if the assured fails to request arbitration, this deprives the insurer of no right whatever. If the insurer is deprived of the right of arbitration, it happens by his own laches. Nor by demanding arbitration can the assured bring that remedy into action, for the insurer may simply ignore such demand, and lose no defense thereby when the cause of action is taken into court. Therefore, under the peculiar conditions of the contract, it depends on the will of the insurer alone as to whether he will have arbitration or not. If he demands it in season, according to the conditions of the policy, and the conditions are shown to exist, which the policy provides shall be submitted to arbitration, then the assured must accede to the request, for the courts will afford him no remedy until he submits to arbitration. (Hamilton v. Insurance Co., supra. But, on the other hand, if the insurer is unwilling to arbitrate, he may ignore the request made by assured therefor, and, under such conditions, to require the assured to make the request, and plead and prove the fact, is to require a vain and useless act, and the ceremony of proving it, which is always against the policy of the law. An important circumstance in the case at bar is that, so far as the record shows, defendant did not at any time signify to plaintiffs a difference of opinion as to the value of said destroyed property, or the amount of damage, as claimed by plaintiffs; or that its neglect to pay said claim was on the ground of a difference of opinion from that expressed in the plaintiffs' proof of loss as to the value of said property. As appears by the record, that point was entirely lost sight of by defendant in its contention that said clause in the proof of loss referring to Ketchum & De Nolle as agreed upon to estimate the value of said building should be stricken out. Upon a careful review of the record it is found that the only expressions by defendant of dissatisfaction as to the stated value of said property was a remark by defendant's agent to one of the assured "that the figures seemed rather high," referring to the estimate by Ketchum & De Nolle. That was before proofs of loss were made and delivered, and the evidence is produced by plaintiffs. The defendant produced no evidence of having signified to plaintiffs a difference of opinion as to the value of the property destroyed from that expressed in plaintiffs' proof of loss. We therefore hold that plaintiffs were not bound to show an appraisal or an award as to the amount of damages sustained; nor were plaintiffs bound to show that they had requested arbitration, and that failure to arbitrate was not through their default.

It is contended by counsel for the appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury to the effect that, if the jury found that plaintiffs were entitled to recover any sum, they were also entitled to interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from and after the expiration of 60 days after proof of the loss was delivered. By the terms of the policy the loss was payable 60 days after proof thereof. At that time the amount of loss became due. We think interest was legally allowable, under our statute, as well as the authorities in such cases. Comp. St. div. 5, § 1237; Albion Lead Works v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 3 Fed. Rep. 197; Hastings v. Insurance Co., 73 N. Y. 141; Field v. Insurance Co., 6 Biss. 121; Insurance Co. v. Gould, 80 Ill. 388; Insurance Co. v. Myer, 93 Ill. 271.

The further assignments of error by appellant's counsel have been carefully considered; but none of them are sustained. The assignments of error not specifically treated appear to be based upon the theory of defense set up by defendant, which we have not sustained. It is ordered that the judgment of the trial court be affirmed, with costs.

RANDALL et al. v. PHOENIX INS. CO. OF BROOKLYN.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 29, 1891.)

FIRE INSURANCE—PROOFS OF LOSS—ARBITRATION—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

1. Though a fire policy provides for arbitration in case of disagreement as to the loss, and that no action shall be sustainable until an award shall have been obtained, the insured who has furnished proofs of loss which are rejected by the company not because there is a disagreement as to the amount of loss, but simply because the proofs contain a statement that the loss was estimated by persons selected by agreement between the assured and the company,—a fact that the company denies,—can sue for the loss without first requesting the appointment of arbitrators.

2. Where the policy provides that it is agreed that an award by arbitrators shall be a condition precedent to the right to sue for the loss, the insured may recover on a petition alleging both an award and also a proof of loss without an award, as the two averments are not inconsistent, since, if the conditions rendering arbitration necessary did not arise, there may be a recovery of the loss though it was not ascertained by an award.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; THOMAS J. GALBRAITH, Judge.

HARWOOD, J. This action was brought to recover $1,500 insurance, upon one of the policies mentioned in the case of Randall v. Insurance Co., ante, 953. That case is referred to for a statement of the pleadings, evidence, and points relied upon by appellant in this case. This cause was tried before the court without a jury; and, by stipulation, the same evidence introduced on the trial of the cause above referred to, by the respective parties, was submitted and considered in this cause, except that the policy of insurance, issued by the Phoenix Insurance Company, was introduced herein. There are no material differences in the two policies as to the provisions requiring proofs of loss. The clause of the Phoenix policy, providing for arbitration to determine the amount of loss, reads as follows: "10. The amount of sound value and of damage to the property, whether real or personal, covered by this policy, or any part thereof, may be determined by mutual agreement between the company and the assured, or failing to agree, the same shall then be submitted to competent and impartial arbitrators, one to be selected by each party, the two so chosen, in case of disagreement, to select an umpire to whom they shall refer each subject of difference, and the award of any two of them, in writing under oath, shall be binding and conclusive as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not determine the validity of the contract, nor the liability of this company, nor any other question, except only the amount of such loss or damage." This policy also contains a clause to the effect that no action against the company, "for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this policy, shall be sustainable until after an award shall have been obtained fixing the amount of such claim in the manner above provided, which is agreed to be a condition precedent." If this latter clause should be given literal effect, it amounts to an agreement that the assured who suffers a loss covered by the policy will not resort to court to compel payment unless defendant consents; for if the assured cannot maintain an action "until an award shall have been obtained, fixing the amount of such claim in the manner provided," and the company does not join in choosing an arbitrator, etc., then the assured could not obtain an award; hence, according to the literal terms of the policy, he could not in that case maintain his action in the court at all. The contract cannot be construed thus, for such a construction makes the clause void. We must, if possible, give this provision such an interpretation as to make it reasonable and not void in law. We therefore construe the provision as to arbitration to mean that the provision shall be brought into action when the insurer asserts a difference as to the amount of value of the property destroyed or damaged, from that stated in the verified proofs of loss, and the clause forbidding the maintenance of an action for recovery of the loss, until after an award shall have been obtained, must be read and applied in connection with the arbitration clause, and it will come into action to bar plaintiff's recovery where he has refused to arbitrate, after the matter for arbitration arose, and the same was seasonably sought in conformity with the terms of the policy, as was the case in Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 136 U. S. 242, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 945, and other cases cited in Randall v. Insurance Co., supra. As will be seen by reference to the case last mentioned, the contention on the part of the respondent was not as to the amount of loss, as stated in the verified proofs of loss, but the contention was that the statement that "loss on building, as estimated by Ketchum & De Nolle & Co., builders, selected by agreement between agent of Cos. and assured," was false, and must be stricken out. Without asserting any other objection or any dissent from the statement of value of the property destroyed as contained in the proofs of loss, the respondent returned said proofs, and declined to receive them on the ground that said statement was made therein. Plaintiffs refused to expunge said statement from the proofs of loss, and, with that contention, it appears negotiations ceased. No offer was made by respondent to pay any sum in settlement of its obligation on said policy, and, no difference of opinion being raised as to the value of the property destroyed, we think the court rightly held that it was not essential for plaintiffs to prove an award, or an attempt to get one, before recovery could be had in this action.

Another point insisted upon by appellant is that the court erred "in trying the case as to the loss of the hotel upon two different and distinct theories, each being incompatible with the other; that is to say, in assuming that under the pleadings the plaintiffs could establish their case on an award or finding by Ketchum & De Nolle, of the value of the hotel at the time of its destruction,—a proceeding on an adjusted loss,—and also on a compliance by the plaintiffs with the terms of the policy, and proof of actual value of the property at the time of its destruction,—a proceeding on an unadjusted loss." The main elements which constituted plaintiffs' cause of action were (1) the contract, i. e., defendant's obligation to pay a certain portion of the value of the property destroyed; (2) the happening of the events which made the obligation payable; (3) the failure to make payment. The obligation on the part of defendant is to pay according to the value of the property, and the contract provides that under certain conditions the value shall be ascertained in a certain manner. This latter provision is incidental to the obligation. The plaintiffs alleged the value of the destroyed property, and also alleged that the value of the hotel had been ascertained by arbitration. This was not an averment of two causes of action, nor was it an averment of two facts "incompatible with each other." It was only alleging the value, and that the same had been ascertained in a manner required by the contract under certain conditions. The fact of ascertaining the value by arbitration would be essential to recovery under certain conditions. Under other conditions it would not. Randall v. Insurance Co., supra. If the conditions were such that the ascertainment of the value by arbitration was not essential, that allegation in the complaint was surplusage, and the proof thereof was not essential to plaintiffs' right to recover. In receiving proofs under such a state of facts offered to establish a liability under a contract comprising these alternative conditions, it was proper for the court to receive proof of the value, as well as proof relating to the ascertainment of that value by arbitration.

The question as to whether arbitration is vital to plaintiffs' right of recovery depends upon whether the conditions arose requiring arbitration. If such conditions did not arise, then arbitration was not essential, and proof of value would be pertinent. If the conditions requiring arbitration arose, and the same failed by the default or misconduct of plaintiffs, their right of recovery in the action would fail, even though they had proved the value of the property otherwise. The observations in this case should be read in connection with the case of Randall v. Insurance Co., supra. On the facts and reasons therein set forth, the judgment and order overruling defendant's motion for new trial herein are affirmed, with costs.

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial is properly refused, where the newly-discovered evidence is argumentative, and a mere repetition of the testimony at the trial, and the documentary evidence relied on is not shown to be relevant, and where the affidavit filed with the application is contradicted by the affidavits of the other party.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; JOHN REYNOLDS, Judge.

J. C. Black, for appellants. D. W. Burchard, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appeal in this action is without merit. The evidence introduced at the trial justified the finding of the court that the respondent was the owner and entitled to the possession of the premises described in the complaint, and that they were unlawfully withheld from her by the defendants. Although a portion of the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff was in some particulars contradicted by the testimony of the appellant, yet the version given by the witness for the plaintiff of the transaction which resulted in her purchase of the premises was so fully corroborated by other uncontradicted portions of his testimony that the court would not have been justified in disregarding it, either in its decision upon the trial, or upon the appellant's motion for a new trial. The newly-discovered evidence set forth in the affidavit of appellant, upon which she sought a new trial, consisted chiefly of a repetition of her testimony at the trial, and is more of an argumentative character than a statement of facts. The documentary evidence referred to in the affidavit is of a date long subsequent to the purchase by the plaintiff of the lands in controversy; and no fact is stated in her affidavit which in any way connected this documentary evidence with such purchase. Moreover, this affidavit of the appellant was so directly contradicted by the affidavits on behalf of the respondent that the court was not bound to accept it as true. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

POIRIER v. GRAVEL. (No. 13,734.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 16, 1891.)

ACTION ON NOTE—PLEADING—CONSIDERATION—VACATING JUDGMENT.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 1614, provides that "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." Section 1615 places the burden of showing want of consideration with the party seeking to avoid it. Held that, in pleading upon a note, it is unnecessary to aver a consideration.

2. A complaint set out a contract whereby defendant agreed to pay money in installments when realized from the products of certain land which she owned, and then alleged that she had sold and conveyed to other persons the land and the products thereof, and had not paid the money as agreed. Held a sufficient statement of a breach of the contract.

3. Upon a motion to vacate a default judgment, the proofs were conflicting, but plaintiff's affidavits showed clearly that defendant's failure to answer in time did not arise from mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect. Held, that the motion was properly overruled.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Brousseau & Hatch, for appellant. H. H. Appel, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action in April, 1889, to recover the sum of $1,500 on a written instrument, which reads as follows: "Los Angeles, Cal., February 9, 1888. $1,700. I hereby promise to pay to Godfrey Poirier the sum of seventeen hundred dollars out of the net proceeds of the products, whether mineral, timber, wood, or any other thing, raised or taken from section 3 of township 11 north, range 15 west of the San Bernardino meridian, in Kern county, state of California; the said sum to be so paid in installments, in such amounts and at such times as I shall realize each month from such products, after payment of all costs and expenses of the gathering or obtaining and selling such products. The said sum of money to be paid only and exclusively from such products of said land as I may be entitled to, and no other property of mine shall be subject to said debt or obligation. MARY PAULINE GRAVEL." It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant, being the owner of an undivided one-half interest of the land described, and being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,700, executed and delivered to plaintiff the instrument on the day of its date, and the plaintiff then and there accepted the same; "that, since the making and delivery of said instrument by defendant to plaintiff, the said defendant has sold, disposed of, and conveyed away to other persons the said land and premises in said agreement described, and all mineral, timber, and wood products thereof, and everything that could and might be gathered and raised from land, and said defendant is no longer the owner thereof; that said defendant has not paid the said sum of seventeen hundred dollars, save and except the sum of two hundred dollars, or thereabouts; and there is due, owing, and unpaid, from defendant to plaintiff, the sum of about fifteen hundred dollars." Wherefore judgment is asked for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and costs of suit. The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and on the 6th of May the demurrer was overruled, and 10 days allowed to answer. Four days later notice of the ruling on the demurrer was served on defendant's attorneys, and on the 31st of the same month, no answer having been filed, judgment by default was entered against the defendant by the clerk for the amount prayed for and costs. On the 7th of June an execution on the judgment was issued and levied on defendant's property, and notice of the time and place of sale was published. On the 2d of July defendant served on plaintiff a notice that on the 8th of that month she would move the court for an order vacating the judgment and setting aside the default taken, upon the ground that the default was entered against her by mistake and inadvertence, and also upon the ground that the judgment was irregular and void, because the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This motion was subsequently heard by the court upon affidavits introduced on both sides, and denied. The defendant then appealed from the judgment, and the order denying her motion.

1. It is contended for appellant that her demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, but we think the ruling proper. The written instrument imported a consideration for its execution, and the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support it was upon the defendant. Civil Code, §§ 1614, 1615. The recital that the defendant, "being indebted," executed the instrument, was not necessary, and may be rejected as surplusage. It is true that a complaint for breach of contract must state the breach in unequivocal language. We think the complaint here fully complied with this rule. It set out the contract whereby the defendant agreed to pay a sum of money in installments, when realized by her from the products of certain land which she owned, and then alleged that she had sold and conveyed to other persons the land and the products thereof, and had not paid a part of the money which she had agreed to pay. This being so, the balance unpaid became immediately due and payable, and the plaintiff could maintain an action for the recovery thereof. The case in this respect is like that of Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 228. There the defendant executed to the plaintiff a written agreement whereby he promised to pay a sum of money when realized from the profits of certain coal mines in which he owned an interest. Before the mines had yielded any profits to the defendant he sold and conveyed his interest in them to a stranger. "By so doing," it was said by this court, "he voluntarily put it out of his power ever to realize any profits from the mines. However great the yield of profits from them might be after that, they could yield none to him. And the principle is elementary that, 'if one voluntarily puts it out of his power to do what he has agreed, he breaks his contract, and is immediately liable to be sued therefor, without demand, even though the time specified for performance has not arrived.' Bishop, Cont. § 1426." See, also, Love v. Mabury, 59 Cal. 484.

2. We cannot say that the court below erred in refusing to vacate and set aside the judgment on the ground that it was taken against defendant through her mistake and inadvertence. The affidavits introduced on the hearing of the motion were conflicting in their statements. Those read by the plaintiff very clearly showed that defendant's failure to answer in time did not arise from mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect. The learned judge who heard the motion must have thought that the plaintiff's affidavits stated the facts truly, and in this we are unable to see that he was mistaken. In our opinion the judgment and orders should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

BROCK v. PEARSON et al. (No. 13,369.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—ASSIGNMENT OF CONTRACT—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—LIS PENDENS.

1. Where the holder of a contract of sale of land transfers it to another in consideration of a conveyance to himself of an undivided fourth interest in the land when a conveyance shall be obtained from the vendor, and the purchaser, by his agent, makes a quitclaim deed of this fourth interest immediately on securing the contract, it operates as an assignment of a one-fourth interest in the contract.

2. This deed was afterwards destroyed at the instance of the purchaser (defendant) of the contract of sale, in order, as he testified, that he might have a clear title to the property, so that he could "handle" it, the seller of the contract to have an interest in the profits arising from the land. Plaintiff's testimony was that the deed was destroyed so that defendant might acquire a clear title to the entire property, a fourth interest in which he was then to convey to plaintiff. Defendant's agent did in fact execute to plaintiff's agent a written assignment of a fourth interest to plaintiff, when the deed was destroyed. Plaintiff also testified that he was to be interested in the profits of a corporation to be formed to take the land, and not in the property itself. Held, the quitclaim deed was destroyed with the single intention of giving defendant a clear title, and not "with intent to extinguish the obligation thereof," within Civil Code Cal. § 1699.

3. The fact that plaintiff's own testimony relative to the intention of the parties in destroying the deed is conflicting, he having testified at one time that he was only to be interested in the profits of a corporation to be formed to take the land, does not bind him to its least favorable aspect for himself, but, it being shown by a preponderance of evidence that he in fact was to have a fourth interest in the land, he is entitled to that.

4. Defendant's agent negotiated the transaction, under verbal instructions "to make the best terms he could to get hold of the property," but he was instructed by letter, which was shown to plaintiff, to "sign nothing to any one," as defendant would "give the contract to carry the various interests" in the land. Held, that the agent had authority to assign plaintiff a fourth interest in the land, in consideration of plaintiff's transferring to defendant his contract of sale.

5. Plaintiff having filed a lis pendens before defendant conveyed to third parties, these latter are charged with notice of his rights.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

King & Sautley, Houghton, Silent & Campbell, and John D. Bicknell, for appellants. Stephens, Appel & Stephens, E. L. Campbell, and Brosseau & Hatch, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit to compel the conveyance of an undivided one-fourth interest in a tract of 704 acres of land in the county of Los Angeles. The trial court decreed the conveyance of a one-eighth interest, and the defendants appealed. The general features of the case are as follows: On the 9th of June, 1887, the owner of the land, one A. W. Timms, gave the plaintiff a contract of sale thereof for the sum of $25,000. The defendant Pearson was desirous of acquiring the property, and instructed one H. V. Burner to negotiate for its purchase. The latter effected an arrangement with plaintiff whereby he was to give up his bargain upon certain terms, which are considered below. The contract of sale, however, was not transferred directly to Pearson or to Burner. By Burner's direction it was transferred to one Weller, who acted in obedience to his instructions. As soon as Weller received the contract of sale, he (by direction of Burner) gave to plaintiff a quitclaim deed purporting to convey a one-fourth interest in the land. On being informed of this, Pearson (who seems at that time, at least, to have supposed that the deed conveyed some title to plaintiff) insisted that it should be destroyed; and under instructions to this general effect Burner induced plaintiff to destroy the deed, under an arrangement which will be considered below. A few days after this (viz., on July 9, 1887) Weller transferred the contract of sale to Burner, who, on the same day, made the first payment to the owner, received a deed from him, executed a mortgage back, and then conveyed the property to Pearson. On the 20th of the same month the plaintiff commenced the present suit, and recorded a notice of lis pendens. Subsequently, Pearson transferred certain interests in the property to third persons, and on October 20th of the same year joined with them in a conveyance of the property to the San Pedro Harbor, Dock & Land Improvement Company. On April 23d of the following year, this corporation conveyed 92 acres of the property to the defendant, the Southern Pacific Railroad Extension Company. The plaintiff subsequently parted with one-half of his one-fourth interest.

The main questions discussed are the following, viz.: What was the agreement which Burner made with the plaintiff for the transfer of the contract of purchase, and what was its effect? what was the effect of the destruction of the "deed" from Weller to Burner? and what was the authority of Burner in the premises?

1. The court finds, in substance, that the agreement made by Burner with the plaintiff was that, if the latter would give up his contract with the owner of the property, Pearson would purchase the property in accordance with such contract, "and would then and there, in consideration of the transfer of such agreement, convey to plaintiff an undivided one-fourth interest in and to said premises, free from all liens and incumbrances." This agreement was not in writing. But there is not the slightest doubt that it was made. Burner so swears, plaintiff so swears, Weller so swears, and there is no evidence to the contrary. The court further finds that, in pursuance of this agreement, the plaintiff transferred the contract of purchase to Weller, who immediately gave to plaintiff a deed purporting to convey an undivided one-fourth interest in the land; and the evidence in support of this finding is uncontradicted. Now, inasmuch as Weller had no title to the land, he could convey none to the plaintiff. But the parties seem to have regarded the "deed" as sufficient to protect the plaintiff's rights. And we think that it operated as an assignment of a one-fourth interest in the contract of sale. Heinlin v. Martin, 53 Cal. 321; Hilton v. Young, 73 Cal. 196, 14 Pac. Rep. 684. It is possible that as against the owner of the property the contract could not be split up in this manner. But no such question can arise between the parties here. It results that after this arrangement the plaintiff had a one-fourth interest in the contract.

2. What was the effect of the destruction of the deed above mentioned? The defendants contend that such destruction was in pursuance of an arrangement made for the purpose of placing the title to the whole property in Pearson, so that he could "handle" it, and that the intention was to extinguish the obligation held by plaintiff, as provided in section 1699 of the Civil Code, and to substitute an arrangement by which the plaintiff was not to have any right to the land, but was only to be interested in the profits to arise from the "handling" of Pearson. The findings, however, distinctly negative any such idea. The court finds that the deed was destroyed under an agreement that when defendant should obtain the legal title he "would immediately better and fully secure plaintiff to an undivided one-fourth interest in and to the same;" that the arrangement was not that plaintiff should be interested only in profits to arise from the acts of Pearson, but that the original agreement "was never modified or changed." These findings are sustained by the testimony of Burner, by the testimony of Weller, and by the testimony of one Barber. And, what is more to the purpose, it was proven that a writing was in fact executed by Weller, (who still held the contract of sale,) whereby a one-fourth interest in such contract was assigned to one Stratton, who was the agent and attorney for plaintiff. In this regard Stratton testified that he was the attorney for plaintiff, and that the arrangement was that, "in lieu of that deed, an assignment should be taken by me to hold for Brock as trustee temporarily until the purchase should be finally consummated, and Pearson should execute proper documents to secure Mr. Brock in his interest." As against this overwhelming evidence, the defendants rely upon the testimony of the plaintiff himself, and insist that he should be bound by it. It is undeniable that the plaintiff (who does not seem to be a very clear-headed man) testified, in a suit by a third party against Pearson, that he was to be interested in the profits of a corporation to be formed, and not in the property itself; and he testified to something like that in the present suit. But he also gave testimony going to show that the corporation was to be a thing of the future, and was not to operate as a present extinguishment of his interest. Thus he says: "I did not understand that he was to sell the property, because I claimed one-fourth in it, and should be consulted, but simply to enable him to carry out a certain scheme of a corporation that was eventually to take this property." And the other witnesses testify that, while there was some talk about a corporation nothing definite was concluded in relation to it.

We cannot agree to the proposition that the plaintiff is bound by such of his testimony as was favorable to the defendants. At the very most, it only amounted to a conflict in the evidence; and it has been said that a conflict is "all the more fatal for being intestine." Crook v. Forsyth, 30 Cal. 662; Bernal v. Wade, 46 Cal. 666. But we go further than this. We think it clear upon the evidence that the right of the plaintiff to an interest in the land was not intended to be extinguished, and that the talk about profits related merely to future action, which was that the property should be put in the hands of Pearson, so that he could "handle" it for the benefit of those interested in it. Such an arrangement could be no stronger than a power of attorney to Pearson. This could be revoked at any time, and whatever arrangement was made was undoubtedly revoked by the commencement of the present suit, and the recording of the notice of lis pendens. One of the learned counsel for the appellants urges in this regard that the plaintiff "cannot place the title unincumbered in Pearson for the purpose of a trade, obtain the money of the corporations, and then be heard to claim that the property was incumbered by some secret trust in favor of himself." And the others say: "Brock permits Pearson to have a clear title for the very purpose of conveying the property to a corporation clear of all incumbrances, and then, when Pearson has so conveyed to such corporation, Brock jumps up to ask that the corporation deed back a part of the property to him," with more in the same strain. The counsel overlook the fact that the present suit was commenced, and the notice of lis pendens recorded, on July 20, 1887, and that the conveyance to the first corporation was not made until October 20, 1887, and to the second not until April 23, 1888. Furthermore, there is not a syllable of evidence in the record to the effect that Pearson ever paid, or offered to pay, any portion of the profits to the plaintiff. On the contrary, he denied that plaintiff had any right to the land, and after the suit was commenced said that he should never get a cent.

3. What was the authority of Burner in the premises? The court finds that Burner "at all times was the duly-authorized agent of the defendant Pearson, with general power to purchase said property." There is evidence in support of this finding. Burner testifies that he "received verbal instructions from the defendant John W. Pearson to purchase the property;" that such instructions "were simply verbal, to get hold of the property as best I could,—that is, to make the best terms I could to get hold of the property;" and that he was not simply to ascertain what the property could be bought for, but to "get hold" of it. We do not see any evidence contradicting these statements. The argument for the appellants is founded on what occurred subsequently. In this regard Burner testifies that after the arrangement was made by which the plaintiff transferred his contract to Weller, and the latter gave back a deed to plaintiff, he (Burner) went to San Francisco, and told Pearson what had been done; whereupon the latter said that "the transaction was satisfactory, except that he did not want that deed out. He said he wanted that deed destroyed. He said he would assign the various interests himself." Pearson's account is somewhat different from this. But he wrote a letter to Burner, in which he said: "There must be no lien or obligation on the 700 acres except the $15,000. I will give the contract to carry the various interests to you and your friend, and for the man from whom you get the bond; so sign nothing to any one," etc. This letter was shown to the plaintiff, and Burner testified that "the transaction would never have went through if I hadn't got the letter then that he would agree to carry those interests satisfactorily to all parties." Upon this evidence the only argument that can be made with any semblance of merit is that Burner had no authority to sign anything; that the culminating act was to be done by Pearson himself; and that the plaintiff knew this, because the letter was shown to him.

But the answer is that there was no need for him to sign anything. As shown under the first head of this opinion, the giving of the deed from Weller to the plaintiff operated as an assignment of a one fourth interest in the contract. The giving up by plaintiff of his bargain was sufficient consideration for this assignment. And Burner had ample authority to make the arrangement, because, as above shown, he was sent with general instructions to "make the best terms I could to get hold of the property." This shown a right in the plaintiff. It devolved upon the defendants to show that such right was destroyed. And in order to do this they are driven to rely, and do rely, upon the destruction of the deed with the consent of the plaintiff. But, in order to sustain this, it was necessary to show that the deed was destroyed "with intent to extinguish the obligation thereof." Civil Code, § 1699. And we think we have shown conclusively, under the second head of this opinion, that there was no intent to "extinguish" the right of plaintiff to a one-fourth interest in the land. It was evidently destroyed under a belief that it conveyed title to the land, and the object was to have the title in the name of Pearson. But the oral evidence clearly shows that there was no intent to extinguish plaintiff's right to a conveyance, which was the only obligation the "deed" could have; and this is further manifest from the fact that a writing evidencing such right was actually given. The intent with which the deed was destroyed is the material thing; and in relation to this it is of no consequence whether Burner or Weller had authority to sign anything or not.

4. The defendants, other than Pearson, had notice of the plaintiff's right when they purchased the property. This is found by the court, and it seems plain that the notice of lis pendens was sufficient to charge them with notice. Randall v. Duff, 79 Cal. 116, 19 Pac. Rep. 532, and 21 Pac. Rep. 610. The amendment to the complaint did not destroy the effect of the notice of lis pendens. The other matters do not require special mention. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—INSUFFICIENCY OF TRANSCRIPT.

An appeal from an order vacating the levy of an execution will be dismissed when it does not appear that all the papers used on the hearing were contained in the transcript.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. Geo. W. Fox, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a motion to vacate the levy of an execution. The transcript contains a copy of the notice of the motion, indorsed, "Read on hearing of motion to vacate levy of execution, November 16, 1888. JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge." Also a copy of the affidavit used, indorsed in the same manner, a copy of the order granting the motion, of the notice of appeal, and the affidavit of service thereof. When the cause was called for argument to-day, (February 11th,) the respondent moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that there was nothing in the record to show that the court below acted upon the papers referred to in the transcript, and the motion was granted. It is claimed by appellant that the indorsement made by the judge is a sufficient authentication of the papers used, and that no other certificate is necessary to identify them, and that a bill of exceptions is unnecessary. There is nothing to show that all of the papers used on the hearing in the court below are before us in this transcript. The judge may have granted the motion on account of the invalidity of the judgment; the execution itself may have been void. It is claimed by appellant that these things will not be presumed, because the notice of motion states that the application will be made on the ground that the property upon which the execution was levied is exempt from execution sale. This may be granted, although as a matter of fact the notice states that the motion will be based on all the papers in the case, and still the order will be sustained upon the presumption that counter-affidavits were filed and used by the respondent. There is nothing to show that counter-affidavits were not filed, and every presumption is in favor of the validity of the judgment. We do not hold that a bill of exceptions is necessary in cases of this kind. The papers may be properly authenticated by the certificate of the judge; but it must be made to appear in some manner that all of the papers used on the hearing are contained in the transcript. In this case it appears simply that the papers referred to and copied in the transcript were indorsed as having been used on the hearing, and placed on file in the court below; whether or not any other papers were used on the hearing, as stated before, does not appear. For the reasons above stated the order dismissing the appeal will stand as entered herein.

CRIMINAL LAW—QUASHING INFORMATION—ILLEGAL COMMITMENT.

Pen. Code Cal. § 995, subd. 1, provides that an information may be set aside where the accused was not legally committed before the filing thereof. Held that, when information is quashed thereunder, the prisoner cannot be held for the filing of a new information without another examination before a committing magistrate.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for petitioner. William S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for the discharge of the prisoner, under a writ of habeas corpus. He is confined in the county jail of the city and county of San Francisco awaiting trial, under an information charging the offense of embezzlement. One of the grounds relied upon by the petitioner for his discharge is that the information upon which he is about to be tried is void by reason of the fact that he has never been legally committed by a magistrate. It appears that the court, upon motion of the defendant, set aside the first information filed against him, upon the ground that he had not been legally committed by a magistrate, and ordered that the district attorney file another information, and it is upon this second information that the defendant is about to be tried. An information can only be set aside upon the grounds: (1) That before filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate. (2) That it was not subscribed by the district attorney of the county. Section 995, Pen. Code. The phrase "legally committed," as used in the foregoing section, refers to the examination of the case, and the holding of the defendant to answer as prescribed by title 3, c. 7, Pen. Code. Section 997, Pen. Code, which prescribes the course to be pursued after an information has been set aside upon motion of the defendant, is vague and unsatisfactory; yet it appears therefrom that the court can only order a new information to be filed when the one in the first instance has been set aside by reason of the failure of the district attorney to subscribe his name thereto, and that when the information is set aside, because the defendant has not been "legally committed," then he must be taken before a committing magistrate for another examination, if the district attorney desires to further prosecute the case. After the magistrate has decided that a public offense has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof, it is his duty to return to the superior court the warrant, depositions, indorsements thereon, undertaking, etc.; and it is upon these depositions and indorsements that the information is based. And, if the information is set aside upon the ground that the defendant has not been legally committed, it can readily be seen that it would be idle for the court to order another information to be filed, for the same fatal defects would necessarily be present at any future hearing. The prisoner is entitled to his discharge, and it is so ordered.

Civil Code Cal. § 226, provides that persons interested in the proceedings on adoption must appear "before the judge of the superior court of the county where the person adopting resides." Held, that an order of adoption is invalid unless it appears from the record that the person adopting resided in the county under the jurisdiction of the superior court before which proceedings were had.

3. Where the order of adoption is invalid on the face of the record, the child must be surrendered, though proceedings are pending to amend the record and make the order valid.

4. Acquiescence for several years by a parent in the claim of adoption does not estop her from claiming the child on the ground that the order of adoption is invalid.

M. Cooney, for petitioner. Henry I. Kowalsky, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. Petitioner is the mother of Charles Henry Clark, a minor, and the respondents, who are husband and wife, claim that he has become their child by adoption. This claim is based upon an order made November 16, 1888, by Hon. JOHN F. FINN, one of the judges of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Attached to the order is a written consent signed by James P. Clark and Annie E. Clark, the parents of the child, consenting that "said Charles Henry Clark may be adopted by Jacob Reulein." Following this is a written agreement and consent signed by David Reulein and Mrs. Katie Reulein, in which the latter consents that David Reulein might adopt the child, and in which David Reulein agrees to adopt the child, and treat him thereafter in all respects as his own lawful child. The order of the judge recites that the parents, James P. and Annie E. Clark, and Jacob Reulein and Katie Reulein, his wife, appeared before him, bringing with them said Charles Henry Clark, aged two years and eleven months; that he examined each of said persons separately, and from such examination found that Jacob Reulein was desirous of adopting said Charles; that his wife, Katie, consented to such adoption, and that it was for the best interests of the child that such adoption should take place; that the parents having signed the necessary consent, and said Jacob Reulein having executed the proper agreement, it was therefore ordered that said Charles Henry Clark should thenceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of said Jacob Reulein. The petitioner herein alleges that the child is restrained of his liberty by John D. Reulein and Katie Reulein. The writ was addressed to them, and an answer has been filed signed by John D. Reulein and Katie Reulein, admitting that they hold the custody of the child, and claiming the right to do so under the order above referred to. It will be observed that the parents consented to the adoption of their child by Jacob Reulein; that the agreement to adopt is signed by David Reulein; and that the order of the court gives the child to Jacob Reulein. There is nothing in the record of the proceeding to show that the names of Jacob Reulein, David Reulein, and John D. Reulein indicate one and the same person. In our opinion, the order is void, and affords respondents no warrant for the detention of the child. It confers no right upon them, and is manifestly too uncertain, when read in connection with the agreements and consents upon which it was based, to render any one liable as the parent by adoption,—especially one whose name does not appear in the record at all.

There is another objection which is fatal to the validity of the proceeding. Section 226, Civil Code, provides that all the persons interested must appear before the judge of the superior court of the county where the person adopting resides. There is nothing in the order, or in any of the papers referred to, showing that Jacob Reulein or David Reulein was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. It has been held—and we think correctly—that in cases of this kind, the power of the court being special, and not exercised according to the course of the common law, its decisions must be regarded and treated like those of courts of limited and special jurisdiction; and that jurisdiction in such cases, although the court be one of general jurisdiction, must appear by the record, as to both subject-matter and the person. Ferguson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 20 Pac. Rep. 842. We have held that our law of adoption is not unconstitutional, (Estate of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. Rep. 379;) but to acquire any right under it its provisions must be strictly followed, and all doubts in controversies between the natural and the adopting parents should be resolved in favor of the former. A child by adoption cannot inherit from the adopting parent unless the act of adoption has been done in strict accordance with the statute. No matter how persuasive may be the equities of the child's case, or how clear the intention of all parties, it must appear that the statutory conditions have been strictly performed, otherwise the relation never existed, and the right to inherit never was acquired. The right of adoption is purely statutory. It was unknown to the common law, and, as the right when acquired under our statute operates as a permanent transfer of the natural rights of the parent, it is repugnant to the principles of the common law; and one who claims that such a change has occurred must show that every requirement of the statute has been strictly complied with. It cannot be said that one condition is more important than another. Tyler v. Reynolds, 53 Iowa, 146, 4 N. W. Rep. 902; Shearer v. Weaver, 56 Iowa, 578, 9 N. W. Rep. 907.

It was stated on the argument that proceedings were pending before Judge FINN to amend the record so as to show that the respondent John D. Reulein is the same person referred to in the proceedings as Jacob Reulein and David Reulein. Assuming that the power to amend the record as suggested exists,—a matter upon which we express no opinion,—we must on habeas corpus take the record as we find it, and determine the rights of the parties accordingly.

Counsel for respondents earnestly urge the court to consider that the claim of respondents has been acquiesced in for several years by the petitioner; that respondents have treated the child well; that a warm affection has sprung up between him and themselves; that petitioner practically abandoned her child when she consented that the order of adoption might be made; and asks permission to prove that respondents are in every sense more worthy to have the custody of the child than the petitioner is. But there can be no estoppel in such a case, and the fitness relatively of the respective parties to care for the child is not a proper subject of inquiry in this proceeding. It is conceded that both parties are competent and fit persons to care for the child. It is doubtless true, as claimed by respondents, that a parent is not entitled to the custody of a child who is old enough to work and care for himself, after consenting to his emancipation; but there is no basis for any such claim in this case. The minor is a young child, incapable of caring for himself, and there is no pretense that the respondents have any authority over him other than such as is conferred by the order referred to. It is ordered that the respondents, John D. Reulein and Katie Reulein, forthwith restore to the petitioner herein the care, custody, and control of said Charles Henry Clark.

WINN V. SHAW. (No. 13,909.)

COUNTY BOARD—PURCHASE OF LAND—NOTICE—INJUNCTION.

1. The California "County Government Act," § 25, subd. 8, confers authority on the board of supervisors to purchase real estate, but provides that no such purchase shall be made unless a notice of such intention is published for at least three weeks in a newspaper of general circulation published in the county, describing the property, and naming the vendor, the price, and the time for completing the purchase. Held, that this is mandatory, and without such publication the board has no authority to make the purchase.

2. A tax-payer may maintain a suit to enjoin the drawing of a warrant for the price of land purchased without the publication of the prescribed notice.

3. To warrant the granting of such injunction, it is not necessary that it be alleged or shown that the county or plaintiff will be damaged if the purchase is completed, or that the value of the land is less than the price to be paid.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see ante, 244.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Shaw, who is the auditor of the county of San Benito, from a judgment enjoining him, as such auditor, from drawing a warrant of said county in favor of one Hodges. The court found that the plaintiff is a resident elector and tax-payer in the county of San Benito; that the board of supervisors of said county made an order declaring their intention to purchase from one Hodges, for the sum of $550, a certain described piece of land for the use of the county, and directed the clerk to give notice of said intention, as required by law; that there were at all times two newspapers of general circulation published in said county, but said notice of intention was not published in any newspaper in said county; that, without such publication, the board of supervisors, at the time fixed in said notice of intention, passed an order to purchase said real estate, and directed the appellant, as auditor, to draw his warrant on the county treasurer for the sum of $550, in favor of said Hodges, upon the delivery of a deed conveying the title to said land, to be approved by the district attorney, and that defendant threatens, and will, unless restrained, draw said warrant, in accordance with said order. The findings further show that in January, 1890, the board of supervisors of said county fixed the price of all county advertising for the ensuing year at 75 cents per square for the first insertion, and 25 cents for each subsequent insertion. In March following the plaintiff and one Shaw, who were the proprietors of the two only newspapers published in the county, entered into an agreement, adopting a uniform schedule of prices to be charged by them for advertising and printing, stipulating that the same should "extend to all county work, and, where possible and necessary, said county work shall be divided as equally between the two offices as possible, each receiving a profit proportionate to the work done." By this agreement said newspaper proprietors were to charge for county printing $1.50 per square, first insertion, and 75 cents per square for each subsequent insertion. The court further finds that neither of said newspapers was "willing" to publish said notice of intention for the price fixed by the board of supervisors, "but they were at all times willing and able to publish the same at the rate fixed by their agreement." It is also averred in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, "that the said sum of money will be paid by the treasurer of the said county of San Benito to said J. I. Hodges, upon receipt of said warrant and the delivery of said deed." The foregoing constitute all the material facts necessary to be considered in giving judgment on this appeal.

1. The county government act provides as follows: "Sec. 25. The boards of supervisors in their respective counties have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law: * * * (8) To purchase * * * any real or personal property necessary for the use of the county, * * * but no purchase of real property must be made unless a notice of the intention of the board to make such purchase, describing the property to be purchased, the price to be paid therefor, from whom it is proposed to be purchased, and fixing the time when the board will meet to consummate such purchase, shall be published for at least three weeks in some newspaper of general circulation published in the county, or, if none be published in the county, then by posting such notice," etc. This provision of the statute, prescribing the manner in which the board shall proceed in making a purchase of real property, cannot be construed as simply directory, but such provision operates as a limitation upon the power of that body to make any purchase of real property, and unless the publication is made as directed the board has no jurisdiction to act at all. The manifest design of the law is that notice of such proposed action shall be given to the tax-payers of the county whose property may be affected by such a purchase, so that by remonstrance or petition they may be able to prevent it, or at least be afforded the opportunity to be heard in the matter, and we have no doubt that a compliance with the statute in this respect is essential to the validity of any such contract of purchase. It is urged, however, that to hold this provision of the statute mandatory is to place in the power of newspaper publishers to enter into illegal combinations, which in effect deprive the board of supervisors of any voice in the matter of determining what shall be paid by the county for such publications, or of exercising any judgment in relation to such subject. And it is argued that this case affords an illustration of the manner in which a county may be subjected to the payment of exorbitant charges, or else cease to perform such governmental functions as, in order to be legally exercised, require published notice at some stage of the proceeding, one instance of which is to be found in the section of the county government act relating to the enactment of ordinances. This is an argument, however, which could more properly be addressed to the legislature. The language of the statute under consideration is plain, and the court must give effect to it as it is written, and, if the evils suggested are likely to flow from this construction, the remedy must be by legislative action. Doubtless the law could be amended so as not to destroy its efficiency, by providing that the publication may be made in any paper circulating in the county, or giving the board a discretion in selecting a paper likely to give notice.

2. The appellant contends that a taxpayer cannot maintain an action in this class of cases, and as authority for this position refers to the cases of Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 174; McCoy v. Briant, 53 Cal. 249; and Merriam v. Supervisors, 72 Cal. 519, 14 Pac. Rep. 137. While there is some general language in each of these cases which lends support to the contention of the appellant on this point, still they are on the facts distinguishable from this, as in neither of them did it appear that the remedy of injunction was necessary in order to keep the county money from being illegally drawn from the treasury. But be that as it may, we are of opinion that a tax-payer of a county has such an interest in the proper application of funds belonging to the county that he may maintain an action to prevent their withdrawal from the treasury in payment or satisfaction of demands which have no validity against the county. The weight of authority seems to be in harmony with this view. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 601; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) §§ 914, 922. In Foster v. Coleman, 10 Cal. 279, the right of the tax-payer to maintain such an action seems to have been assumed; and in the later case of Shakespeare v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638, 20 Pac. Rep. 294, it was held that a tax-payer of a school-district could compel the cancellation of an illegal warrant drawn upon the superintendent of streets, and that such officer could, in the same action, be restrained from drawing a requisition on the county auditor, as directed by such illegal order.

3. It is further urged that there is no allegation or finding that the county or plaintiff will suffer any damage if the land of Hodges is accepted and paid for; that it does not appear that its value is any less than the price agreed to be paid for it. But the question here is not whether the county will profit or lose by the transaction. If the law forbids the making of such a contract, unless preceded by publication of the notice of intention to make it, that must be the end of the matter, as in such case there can be no legal liability upon the part of the county to pay, and the object of this action is to prevent an illegal payment of public money. This principle was applied in Shakespear v. Smith, supra. In that case it was not denied that the school district was justly indebted to the payee in the order named, and the court said: "The only vice in the transaction consists in its allowance by a party in interest, which raises an implication of fraud, and renders the order void." The vice of the contract in this case is that it was made without authority of law, and, this appearing, it is void. There are other matters discussed in the brief of counsel, but we have not thought it necessary to discuss them. The question as to the validity of the contract made between the proprietors of the newspapers is not involved in this case. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 11, 1891.)

VACATION OF DECREE—FRAUD—BRIBING WITNESS.

A decree will not be vacated merely because the prevailing party obtained it by bribing a witness to swear falsely.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson and Del Valle & Munday, for appellants. A. Brunson and Stephen M. White, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a suit in equity to vacate and annul a final decree in another action between the same parties on the ground that it was procured by fraud. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and thereupon gave judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals. The principal question presented by the appeal, and the only question we find it necessary to consider, is whether the complaint, taken as true, presents a case entitling the plaintiff to the relief demanded, or to any relief. It is alleged that in April, 1883, the plaintiff was owner of several parcels of real estate in Los Angeles, then worth over $200,000, and of still greater value now. That one parcel of the land had been sold under decree of foreclosure, and the time for redemption was about to expire. That there were other pressing liens resting upon the whole property, amounting, with the sum necessary to redeem the parcel sold, to about $62,000 as then estimated. That plaintiff was anxiously endeavoring to raise money to effect such redemption and save his property from sacrifice. That one B. Cohn, since deceased, whose administrator is the principal defendant herein, offered to loan, and did loan, him the necessary sum, taking for security a grant absolute in terms of the incumbered property. The consideration expressed in the deed was the exact sum at which the liens and incumbrances on the land were estimated,—$62,000. The value of the land was, as above stated, over $200,000. Within a month or two after the execution of his deed, plaintiff tendered Cohn $65,000, and demanded a reconveyance, which was refused, whereupon he commenced an action to compel a reconveyance, alleging in his complaint that his grant to Cohn was, in fact, a mortgage to secure a loan. Cohn answered, alleging that the transaction was an absolute sale. Upon a trial of this issue the superior court found for the plaintiff, and decreed a reconveyance upon payment of $103,000, this being the amount of the sum originally advanced by Cohn, and certain additional sums which he was found to have expended subsequently in the compromise and settlement of other claims against the property. But on motion of the defendants in that action the superior court ordered a new trial unless the plaintiff would consent to a modification of the findings and decree, adding $35,000 to the amount to be paid defendants upon reconveyance of the land; and, the plaintiff failing to consent to such modification, the order for a new trial was made absolute, and, upon appeal of the plaintiff, was affirmed by this court. 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. Rep. 680. Thereupon a new trial was had in the superior court, but before a different judge, who found upon the principal issue in favor of the defendants, and decreed against the right of redemption. From that decree, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff again appealed to this court, where the decree and order were affirmed, (78 Cal. 384, 20 Pac. Rep. 706.) upon the ground that, the evidence being conflicting, the findings of the lower court could not be disturbed. It is to annul the decree so affirmed that the present action is brought, and the fraud by which it was procured is shown by allegations in substance as follows: At the date of the original transaction with Cohn, Pico was an old man over 80 years of age, unable to speak or understand the English language, unused to complicated statements or accounts, easily deceived, and in great distress and trouble regarding his business affairs. He confided in Cohn, relied upon him implicitly, and at his solicitation abstained from consulting his usual legal advisers. In the conduct of the negotiations with Cohn the only other person present was one Pancho Johnson, who knew everything that took place, and well knew that the transaction was a loan and security, and not a purchase and conveyance absolute; and, shortly after the execution of the deed, so stated in the presence of Pico's attorneys and numerous other persons. Relying on Johnson's knowledge of the transaction, and his statements concerning it, Pico called him as a witness on the first trial of the action to redeem, when, instead of testifying that the transaction was a loan and mortgage, he testified that it was a sale and absolute conveyance; but, in spite of his adverse testimony, the court, as above shown, found for the plaintiff. Before the cause came on for trial a second time, Johnson was dead; but his testimony, as given on the first trial, had been reduced to writing, and was on file among the papers in the case. Plaintiff and his counsel knew that this testimony was false in its general statement to the effect that the conveyance to Cohn was absolute, and they suspected that Cohn had bribed the witness to so testify; but they had no evidence of such bribery, although they had used the utmost diligence to discover it. Upon mature consideration, they decided at the second trial to put in evidence the written transcript of Johnson's testimony at the first trial. Among their reasons for doing so were the following: Other testimony in the case showed that Johnson was present during the negotiations between Pico and Cohn, not only as interpreter, but as the particular friend and adviser of the former; and counsel for plaintiff feared that by omitting to offer Johnson's testimony they would incur the odium of suppressing evidence known to exist, whereas by putting it before the court they would have the advantage of some facts that they could prove by no other witness. They would have his admission of other facts inconsistent with the theory of a sale. The court would see that he was hostile to Pico, and he could be contradicted by proof of his statements made in the presence of others. Without going more fully into the reasons which induced counsel for plaintiff to submit the testimony of Johnson to the consideration of the court on the second trial of the former action, we content ourselves with saying that the allegations of the complaint show that the course pursued by them was, under the circumstances, wise and proper, if not absolutely necessary. But, contrary to their expectations, the court believed his false testimony, and for that reason alone decided against the plaintiff. In support of this conclusion, the complaint sets out the substance of all the testimony of Cohn and Pico, and in detail the material portions of Johnson's testimony, from which, with other averments, it appears that but for Johnson's positive perjury and suppression of the truth the judgment here in question would not have been given. This being shown, it is next alleged that, after the final affirmance of that judgment by this court, plaintiff made the discovery that Cohn had paid Johnson $2,000 to testify falsely. The particulars of this bribery and its discovery are detailed in the complaint, and show that on the very morning that Johnson gave his testimony Cohn placed $2,000 in the hands of one Forbes, with directions given in Johnson's presence to pay it to him if he testified to an absolute sale, and that, immediately after he had so testified, he demanded and received the money.

It is averred, and we think sufficiently shown, that upon proof of these facts there is a reasonable certainty that plaintiff would upon another trial gain his cause. Such being the case, is plaintiff entitled to a decree vacating and annulling the former decree on the ground that it was procured by fraud? After a careful and extended examination of the authorities, we are constrained to answer this question in the negative. That a former judgment or decree may be set aside and annulled for some frauds there can be no question, but it must be a fraud extrinsic or collateral to the questions examined and determined in the action. And we think it is settled beyond controversy that a decree will not be vacated merely because it was obtained by forged documents or perjured testimony. The reason of this rule is that there must be an end of litigation; and when parties have once submitted a matter, or have had the opportunity of submitting it, for investigation and determination, and when they have exhausted every means for reviewing such determination in the same proceeding, it must be regarded as final and conclusive, unless it can be shown that the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon, or that the prevailing party, by some extrinsic or collateral fraud, has prevented a fair submission of the controversy. What, then, is an extrinsic or collateral fraud, within the meaning of this rule? Among the instances given in the books are such as these: Keeping the unsuccessful party away from the court by a false promise of a compromise, or purposely keeping him in ignorance of the suit; or, where an attorney fraudulently pretends to represent a party, and connives at his defeat or, being regularly employed, corruptly sells out his client's interest. U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 65, 66, and authorities cited. In all such instances the unsuccessful party is really prevented by the fraudulent contrivance of his adversary from having a trial; but when he has a trial he must be prepared to meet and expose perjury then and there. He knows that a false claim or defense can be supported in no other way; that the very object of the trial is, if possible, to ascertain the truth from the conflict of the evidence, and that necessarily the truth or falsity of the testimony must be determined in deciding the issue. The trial is his opportunity for making the truth appear. If, unfortunately, he fails, being overborne by perjured testimony, and if he likewise fails to show the injustice that has been done him, on motion for a new trial, and the judgment is affirmed on appeal, he is without remedy. The wrong, in such case, is, of course, a most grievous one, and no doubt the legislature and the courts would be glad to redress it if a rule could be devised that would remedy the evil without producing mischief far worse than the evil to be remedied. Endless litigation, in which nothing was ever finally determined, would be worse than occasional miscarriages of justice; and so the rule is that a final judgment cannot be annulled merely because it can be shown to have been based on perjured testimony; for, if this could be done once, it could be done again and again, ad infinitum. But counsel for appellant seek to distinguish this case from those in which it has been held that a judgment will not be set aside by reason of its being based upon forged documents or perjured testimony. They say that the fraud committed by Cohn was the bribing of Johnson; that this was collateral and extrinsic; that it was not, and could not have been, the subject of investigation at the trial of the original action. We do not think this distinction can be maintained. The fraud which Cohn committed was the production of perjured evidence in support of his defense. The means by which he induced the witness to swear falsely was but an incident. It may be safely asserted that a witness does not often deliberately perjure himself without being induced thereto by some fraudulent or corrupt practice on the part of him who gets the advantage of the perjury. It is a matter of indifference what particular form such corrupt practice takes. The evil and the wrong is in the perjury which follows. In this case the truth of Johnson's evidence was necessarily drawn in question at the trial, and determined by the decision of the court; and all that has since been discovered is another item of testimony bearing on that point. We cannot find any substantial ground upon which this case can be distinguished from U. S. v. Throckmorton, supra. The decision in that case has been approved by this court as recently as In re Griffith, 84 Cal. 113, 23 Pac. Rep. 528 and 24 Pac. Rep. 381. The following decisions of this court are also in point: Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 321; Mining Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 176. Many other authorities to the same effect are cited in the brief for respondents. On the other hand, the case of Laithe v. McDonald, 7 Kan. 254, 12 Kan. 340, directly supports the position of appellant, as does the case of Fabrilus v. Cock, 3 Burrows, 1771. The cases of Verplanck v. Van Buren, 76 N. Y. 247, and Dringer v. Railway Co., 42 N. J. Eq. 573, 8 Atl. Rep. 811, contain expressions which seem to imply the same doctrine, but they do not directly support it. Other cases cited by appellant are less in point. We think, on the whole, that it is settled by the great weight of authority that the plaintiff's action cannot be maintained, and that the judgment of the superior court must be affirmed. So ordered.

RAPE—CIVIL ACTION—EVIDENCE.

The complaint in an action by husband and wife alleged that defendant forcibly assaulted the wife, and had sexual intercourse with her against her will. She testified that defendant forcibly got into bed with her, and assaulted her, but did not have connection with her, and that she was made sick and so remained for more than a month, but she did not tell her husband of the occurrence until 10 days after it. Defendant testified that he had connection with her on that occasion and subsequently, but each time with her consent. He also testified, without being contradicted, that two days afterwards he took her to the railroad station at her request, and that she asked him to call on her at S., whither she was going. He further testified that afterwards, in the presence of a third person, he stated to her that he had had connection with her with her consent, and that she did not deny it. This third person was in court, but did not testify, and the wife did not contradict defendant on this point. Held, that the evidence would not sustain a verdict for plaintiffs.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

F. P. Tuttle, (Grove L. Johnson, of counsel,) for appellant. J. D. Sullivan and J. M. Tulweiler, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. When this cause was in department 1 the following opinion was prepared by Commissioner BELCHER. It is hereby adopted by the court in bank, and for the reasons therein stated the judgment and order of the superior court are reversed, and the cause remanded.

"The facts stated in the complaint are these: The plaintiffs were husband and wife, and on or about the 26th day of October, 1887, at their residence in the town of Auburn, Placer county, the defendant wickedly, maliciously, and violently assaulted said Johanna Lind, one of the plaintiffs herein, by jumping upon her while she was in bed, and holding her down, and, willfully contriving and intending to injure plaintiffs, defendant did then and there ravish and carnally know said Johanna Lind, without her consent and against her will, whereby she was made sick and sore in body, etc., to the plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $50,000. The answer denies that defendant, at the time named in the complaint, or at any time, violently or wickedly or maliciously or at all assaulted the plaintiff Johanna, or that he jumped upon her or held her down, or that he ravished her or carnally knew her against her consent or against her will, and denies that she was made sick or sore in body, or that by reason of the premises plaintiffs had suffered damages in the sum of $50,000, or in any other sum. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned for $2,500 damages, for which judgment was entered. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground, among others, that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, and his motion was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and order.

"The plaintiff Johanna was called as a witness, and testified that she was born in Germany and had been married about six years; that she was married in Connecticut, and about a year thereafter came to California; that in April, 1887, she and her husband went to defendant's place, and worked for him for one month; that they then left, but after about three months the husband again worked for defendant for one month; that in September, 1887, they went to live in a house known as the 'Collins House,' and about fifteen minutes' walk from defendant's house; and that on the morning of October 18th the husband went to San Francisco, leaving the witness alone with her two children. What afterwards occurred the witness relates as follows: 'When evening came I put the children to sleep, and I locked my door, and then I sat down to write a letter. Before I went to bed I went again to see if the doors and windows were fastened tight. I then went to bed. I could not sleep. I was afraid, and very near midnight I heard somebody knock. Somebody came then to the house and knocked several times, and asked if Mr. Lind was at home. I didn't answer the first, but then he knocked again and said, "Mrs. Lind, open the door. I want to come in to you;" and I could hear then right away it was Mr. Closs, and I said, "No, sir, Mr. Closs;" I was not going to open the door. "If you want to see me, come to-morrow,"—I would be at home; and he went, and it was only a minute and I heard something at the back door, and in a minute he stood in my sleeping-room where I was lying with my children, and he said that I should make room for him in the bed, so he might come into bed to me, and I told him I would not let him come in the bed; and he said I should not be particular, and that I was such a funny woman. I was not like other women he had ever known in his life. And so in that time he had his clothes off, and he jumped right into bed, and I put my little baby on the side, because I wanted and needed both my hands; and he took off the quilt, and he tried to do several things. He took hold of me, and was trying to do what he wanted. I struggled with him fifteen or twenty minutes. I told him he should leave me, and that I should make it hot for him, and so at last he got out of the bed, and dressed himself, and went away. I didn't rest any that night, and in the morning was sick, and remained sick two or three days. My husband came home the next day, and I was sitting there sick when he came home, and the next day after that we packed up, and the third day we went to San Francisco, and I got sicker and sicker. Was sick a month after that. I had pains all over, and brain fever; pains in my head.' And on cross-examination the witness said: 'I went to bed on this night about 9 or 10 o'clock. My bedroom is a front room. To get into my bedroom a person coming in the back door would have to pass through two rooms. Before Closs came in he knocked at the bedroom window several times. I heard a noise at the back door, and in a moment Closs was in the room. The door opened with very little noise. I heard no crashing sound. I examined the lock afterwards, and there was nothing broken. There was a light in the bedroom. I had my two children in bed with me, one on each side of me. When Closs came in I said to him, "You have no business here," and that he should walk right out. He commenced talking to me, and while he was talking he was taking his clothes off. He disrobed entirely down to his undershirt. I remained in bed all the time. As quick as he had his clothes off he jumped into the bed, threw the bedclothes over, and lifted up my clothes. We did not wake the children up. I was pushing him away from me. He did not beat or strike me. He did not accomplish his purpose. He then got up, dressed, and went away. He didn't hurt me, but tried to keep me down. In the latter part of October, about ten days after it occurred, I told my husband. I told my husband just as I have stated here. After talking with my husband he said he would fix Closs, and he would demand $1,000 from Closs; and I sat down and wrote a letter to Closs demanding $1,000. I first went to a lawyer about it in January, 1888. Closs called on me while I was in San Francisco, about three weeks after this trouble. He called again between Christmas and New Year's, and saw my husband and myself. He called on me and my husband at those times in San Francisco to try to settle.'

"The defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and testified that he had a ranch of eighty acres, about one mile from the town of Auburn, on which he had resided for about four years; that in February, 1887, he desired help on his ranch, and advertised for it; that in answer to the advertisement the plaintiffs came to his ranch, and the wife went to doing household work and the husband outside work for him; that they then left and moved into the 'Collins House,' which was about ten minutes' walk from his house. He then says: 'In October she told me her husband was going to San Francisco. I went to her house about half-past ten or eleven o'clock. I did not know whether Lind had returned or not. I knocked at the window, and asked if Lind was there, and I asked her to let me come in, and she told me first to go away and come to-morrow. Mrs. Lind told me that he was not there, and then I went around, and went in by the open back door. * * * The door was not locked. I was not obliged to put my shoulder to the door, and made no unusual effort to get in. When I lifted the thumb-latch the door opened readily. I went in the bedroom, and Mrs. Lind picked up a child which was in the bed, and put it in an adjoining bed. I undressed myself and stayed there a couple of hours. Mrs. Lind asked me to come back the following day. I saw her next day and the day after, and she was not sick at all. Mrs. Lind asked me for the use of my buggy to go to the station, and I myself took Mrs. Lind to the depot in the buggy the second day after this night. She gave me her address in San Francisco, and invited me to call when I went down. I went to see her in San Francisco, and she there told me that her husband had suspected something, and she had told him only of this one night when he was away, and that her husband was mad, and I should give him a few dollars. I saw Mrs. Lind in the presence of Mr. Sullivan, and there told her that she knew I never had used any violence, and that it was all done with her will. She admitted that. She then said she wouldn't like to go to Auburn, and if I would pay $500 she would not. I never used any violence on her, and never made any assault upon her. Everything was done with her will and consent.'

"The husband was called as a witness in rebuttal and testified: 'Had a conversation with Closs about Christmas, 1887, and he told me about having connection with her on the night of October 18, 1887, and that he had never done so before.'

"This was substantially all the testimony in the case, and the question is, did it justify the verdict? The court instructed the jury that the complaint charged a violent assault made by defendant upon the person of Mrs. Lind, and that she was debauched against her consent and will; that the case turned upon the question of violence, and that if violence was used, as charged, then they should find for the plaintiffs; but that if no violence was used, the connection being with her consent, then the verdict should be for defendant. The instructions were the law of the case, so far as the jurors were concerned, and they were bound to follow them, whether they deemed them correct or not. As to whether violence was used or not, the testimony was conflicting. Mrs. Lind stated positively that violence was used, and the defendant stated equally positively that it was not. If the case had been rested on this conflict alone, the judgment, under a well-settled rule, would have to be affirmed. But other facts and circumstances appeared which seem to us to militate strongly against the truthfulness of Mrs. Lind's statements. The following examples may be noted: She testified that defendant did not accomplish his purpose, and that she told her husband about the matter as she had told it in court, and yet the complaint, which was verified by the husband and filed in February following, charges that he did accomplish his purpose, and this defendant in effect admitted both in his answer and testimony. How is this discrepancy to be accounted for? She further testified that she did not tell her husband of the outrage which she had suffered for ten days, though she was made sick by it, and so continued for a considerable time. Is it probable that a woman would, under such circumstances, remain silent so long in the presence of her husband? The defendant testified that two or three days after the alleged offense, when Mrs. Lind was about to leave for San Francisco, she asked him for the use of his buggy to go to the station, and that he took her to the depot in his buggy; and this is not denied. Now, is it conceivable that a woman, who had been treated as it is claimed she had been, would so soon ask or accept such favors from the man who had committed the wrongs against her? Defendant further testified that Mrs. Lind gave him her address in San Francisco, and invited him to call on her there; and this is not denied. Now, is it possible that she would have done so if she had been assaulted, as stated, two days before? Again, defendant testified that on one occasion, when he saw Mrs. Lind in San Francisco, he told her, in the presence of Mr. Sullivan, that she knew he had never used any violence, and she so admitted. Now this statement was either true or false. If true, it shows that the plaintiffs, under the instructions of the court, were not entitled to recover. But it was not denied, though she and Sullivan must have been in court, and if untrue presumably would have denied it. It has been several times held in this state, where the accused parties had been convicted of rape on the testimony of the complainant alone, and under circumstances tending to throw discredit upon her testimony, that the judgments should be reversed; the court saying that 'a conviction upon such evidence would be a blot upon the jurisprudence of the country and a libel upon jury trials,' and that 'the ends of justice demand that the cause shall be tried anew.' People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221; People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540; People v. Brown, 47 Cal. 447; People v. Ardaga, 51 Cal. 371. We think these cases in point here, and that the ends of justice require that this case be tried anew. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

POWERS OF SUPERVISORS—VISITING DISORDERLY HOUSE—EXCESSIVE PUNISHMENT.

1. Where the legislature confers upon the board of supervisors the power to determine the penalties, specifying a maximum limit, which shall be incurred for the breach of its regulations, the board must itself designate the penalty for each offense, and not leave it to the discretion of the judge.

2. St. Cal. 1861, p. 552, giving the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco power to determine the penalties for breach of its regulations, with the maximum limit of $1,000, or six months' imprisonment, or both, does not authorize the maximum penalty for violation of every regulation. The penalty must be reasonable, with reference to the offense, and section 33 of order 1587, as amended by order 1955, of the board of supervisors, leaving it to the discretion of the judge to fix the punishment for visiting a house of ill fame, with a maximum limit of $1,000 fine, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, since it gives the judge power to fix an unreasonable punishment for the offense, is void.

HARRISON, J. The petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco of a misdemeanor, for visiting a house of ill fame, and on the 7th day of March, 1890, was sentenced "to pay a fine of four hundred dollars, and, in default of payment thereof, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of said city and county at the rate of one day for each one dollar of fine until said fine is satisfied." Under a commitment issued upon this judgment he was immediately taken into the custody of the sheriff, and has since that day been confined in the county jail of San Francisco. Section 33 of order No. 1587, as amended by order No. 1955, of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, under which his conviction was had, is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person in the city and county of San Francisco to keep or maintain, or become an inmate of, or a visitor to, or in any manner to contribute to the support of, any disorderly house, or houses of ill fame, or place for the practice of gambling, or knowingly let or underlet, or transfer the possession of, any premises for use by any person for any of said purposes. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine of not less than twenty dollars, or imprisonment not less than ten days." The maximum amount of the punishment for this offense is not defined, but is left to the discretion of the court, except as it is qualified by the provisions of section 1 of order 1587, which reads as follows: "Any person violating any of the provisions of this order shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Construing these two sections together as defining the extent of the punishment of the offense, it results that the ordinance provides that the penalty for visiting a house of ill fame shall not be less than $20, nor more than $1,000. Municipal ordinances must be reasonable, and the penalties prescribed for their violation must also be reasonable as well as definite. It is not essential, however, that the precise amount of the penalty for each offense shall be designated in the ordinance. It is sufficient if it be left to the discretion of the court, within fixed, reasonable limits. The maximum limit must, however, be reasonable. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 333, 341. The legislature (St. 1861, p. 552) has given to the city and county of San Francisco power "to determine the fines, forfeitures, and penalties that shall be incurred for the breach of regulations established by its board of supervisors," with the maximum limit of $1,000, or six months' imprisonment, or both. But it does not follow that the city is authorized to affix this maximum penalty for the violation of every regulation that it may establish under its general power to define offenses and prescribe penalties therefor. It is not justified in prescribing the same penalty for each offense which it may define. Penalties should be prescribed with reference to the offenses which are committed, rather than to the power under which they may be prescribed. This power to "determine" the penalties which shall be incurred for the breach of its regulations has been conferred upon the city, and must be exercised by its board of supervisors, and not left to the discretion of the judge before whom the offense is tried. In re Frazee, 63 Mich. 408, 30 N. W. Rep. 72. The board of supervisors must itself fix, within limits which are reasonable, the penalty to be incurred for the violation of each ordinance. If, however, the board of supervisors does not determine the penalty in any other terms than that it shall not be less than $20, but leaves to the judge the power to affix the maximum amount of punishment which the legislature has authorized to be affixed for the violation of any ordinance, instead of fixing the penalty within reasonable limits, it gives to the judge the discretion of determining what the penalty shall be for each offense. This has the same effect as if it had itself fixed the maximum limit of the penalty at $1,000. But a municipal ordinance which shall prescribe a fine of $1,000, as the penalty for visiting a house of ill fame, would be not only unreasonable, as imposing a punishment greatly disproportionate to the offense, but would also be inconsistent with the general principles of the Penal Code upon kindred topics. In the exercise of the power conferred upon it to "regulate all practices which are contrary to public order and decency," by virtue of which this ordinance was adopted, (St. 1863, p. 540,) it was incumbent upon the city to frame the ordinance, so far as practicable, in harmony with the general laws of the state. Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 225; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 319. The act of which the petitioner was convicted is not enumerated among the crimes which are defined in the Penal Code, but is made an offense solely by virtue of the ordinance. The legislature has not deemed it necessary to prescribe any punishment therefor, and, from the statutes which it has adopted upon kindred topics, the penalty allowed by the ordinance in question must be held to be not in harmony with its general policy. By the provisions of section 647 of the Penal Code, a person "who lives in and about houses of ill fame" is punishable only by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 90 days, and, by section 315 of that Code, the extent of punishment to be inflicted upon the person who "keeps" a house of ill fame is limited to imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or a fine not exceeding $500, or both. We are of the opinion that so much of the ordinance in question as permits a fine of $1,000 to be imposed as the penalty for visiting a house of ill fame is unreasonable, and not in harmony with the laws of the state, and therefore void. The petitioner must therefore be discharged from custody. It is so ordered.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the order discharging the petitioner, upon the ground that under a penal statute or ordinance, imposing imprisonment not exceeding a certain term, or fine, or both, a defendant cannot be kept in jail, under the pretense of enforcing the fine, for a term longer than the maximum term of imprisonment prescribed by the statute. This has always been my opinion. In this case the petitioner should have been discharged at the end of six months, which is the maximum term of imprisonment prescribed. Under the other view (if the ordinance be valid) the petitioner could have been fined $1,000, and, in default of payment, sent to jail for a thousand days, which, under the circumstances, would have been still more cruel and absurd.

GIANT-POWDER CO. v. SAN DIEGO FLUME CO. (No. 13,906.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 12, 1891.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—COMPLETION OF WORK.

A contractor engaged in preparing a flume-bed, surface ditch, and terminal approaches for a water-works company abandoned the contract, with the consent of the company. Held, that the company, by releasing the contractor, and taking control of the work for the purpose of completing it, "occupied" and "accepted" it, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, (Amend. Laws Cal. 1887,) which requires a material-man furnishing material to a contractor to file his lien claim within 30 days after the completion of the structure, and which provides that the "occupation" of the structure by the owner, or its "acceptance" by him, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of completion; and a material-man who files his lien within 30 days after the company assumed control of the work acquires a valid lien for material furnished the contractor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

J. F. Cowdery, for appellant. Shaw & Holland, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought against Joseph Johndrew, "an original contractor," for the San Diego Flume Company, and that corporation, to recover a judgment for the value of materials furnished the contractor, which were used in his work upon the structure for the flume company, and to enforce a material-man's lien upon the structure, under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The evidence and the findings indicate that, after the 6th day of June, A. D. 1887, there existed a valid contract between the contractor and the owner, so that, as to all materials furnished after that date, the plaintiff could file its lien claim, by virtue of the existence of the contract. The court below seems to have proceeded under this impression, and to have based its decision, which was against the plaintiff, so far as the right to enforce its lien was concerned, or any other claim against the flume company, upon the theory that its claim of lien had been filed before the acceptance, completion, use, or occupation of the structure, according to the terms of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1887. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment against it in favor of the flume company, and from an order refusing a new trial.

Does the evidence sustain the finding that the plaintiff filed its lien claim before the defendant had accepted, used, or occupied the work which the contractor had left in an uncompleted state? The work which the contractor was to perform was the grading of a flume-bed, surface ditches, and tunnel approaches, from the defendant's diverting dam on the San Diego river to its proposed city reservoir near San Diego, and the excavation of about 3,000 lineal feet of tunnels, and lining the same with masonry, and also timbering same, in accordance with the plans and specifications. Thus it will be observed the contractor was not to complete the flume, or to make complete the proposed water-works of the defendant, but only to prepare the place upon which the flume was to be thereafter placed. He was to lay the foundation, as it were, on which the flume was to rest. In this respect the work to be done was somewhat similar to the laying of a foundation on which to erect a house. It appears that about August 9, 1887, the contractor abandoned his contract, and ceased all work thereunder; that two or three days after that the flume company took possession of the flume line upon which the contractor had been working, and proceeded to complete the work which he had left unfinished. But the court finds that it neither used nor occupied the tunneling, grading, and work which Johndrew had agreed to do. "Nor did it on or about the 10th of August, 1887, or at any time, or at all, ever accept the structure which Johndrew had been engaged in constructing for it, or accept the uncompleted part thereof." The part of section 1187, Code Civil Proc., here involved reads: " * * * And in case of contracts, the occupation or use of the building, improvement, or structure by the owner or his representative, or the acceptance by said owner or his agent of said building, improvement, or structure, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of completion." The provision seems to have been enacted in the interest of and for the better protection of lien claimants like the plaintiff. The words of the statute "occupy or use" or "accept" have reference not only to the occupation, use, or acceptance of a dwelling or other house, but to any kind of structure, building, or improvement in which the materials of a lien claimant have been used. What, then, is to be deemed their meaning, with regard to the matter in hand? The facts appear to be that the contractor, on or about the 9th of August, 1887, was unable to go on with his work. Then, or a day or two thereafter, the defendant made an arrangement by which the contractor was to be absolved from his obligation under the contract, which was to be abrogated, and the defendant was to pay a certain proportion of his debts, on conditions, not including that of the plaintiff, and to have and retain certain property belonging to the contractor. It thereupon took control and possession of the work, and proceeded to complete it. The defendant, having gotten rid of the contractor by this arrangement, dominated, controlled, and applied to its uses the uncompleted work of the contractor, in the prosecution of which the materials of the plaintiff had been used. It occupied the work, so far as could be done, in its then state. But it used and occupied his work after the rescission of its contract with the contractor, making this work subservient to its purposes in completing the structure. It took from the contractor what he had done of the work, and also certain property of his, released him from his contract, and agreed to settle some of his debts. If it released the contractor, took his work, and some of his property, and agreed to pay some of his debts, this would appear to be, in a certain sense, an acceptance of his work. It did not occupy and use the work in the sense that it was complete according to the terms of the contract, but, after the contractor was released, it used and occupied it as the contractor had done before. His responsibility on the contract to the defendant was ended. The latter took his work and other property, and proceeded under this agreement to use and occupy the work, agreeing at the same time to pay a certain proportion of the contractor's debts; that is, it took and used, under agreement with him, what he had left, and absolved him from his contract. The lien claim was filed on the 5th of September, 1887, within 30 days after the acceptance, use, and occupation above stated. Under our view of the statute this was sufficient. The contractor's connection with the defendant was completed and ended. The defendant accepted the work he had done, and used and occupied it so far as it was capable of being so used or occupied. The findings are not supported by the evidence. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal solely upon the ground that, in my opinion, the main points in controversy were settled against respondent on the former appeal, (78 Cal. 193, 20 Pac. Rep. 419,) and the law of the case applies; otherwise I would hold that the lien of appellant was premature. And, where the question is open, I could not concur in the doctrine that there can be a lien for powder exploded in blasting for the foundation of a house or a flume. "Materials used in the construction," as employed in the mechanic's lien law, means, in my opinion, only such material things as go in, and become part of, the building or structure. In the eye of justice, a merchant who deals in lumber or hardware has no more right to a lien than a merchant who deals in potatoes, or flour, or sugar; and the former have a lien only as a legislative privilege. The language should not be strained for the purpose of enlarging the privileged class. The appellant has no powder in the structure, and never had. It merely exploded some there.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment, and in the foregoing opinion of Commissioner FOOTE. The question whether powder exploded in the work of constructing a flume or tunnel may be regarded as a part of the "materials used in the construction" is not involved in the disposition of this appeal.

SAN DIEGO LAND & TOWN CO. v. NEALE

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 14, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—ELEMENTS OF VALUE—EVIDENCE.

1. On condemnation of land for public use, the present market value, and not the value to the owner or to the person seeking to condemn it, is the basis of compensation.

v.25P.no.14—62

2. In condemnation of land for reservoir purposes, estimates of value based on the cost of the proposed water-works, the increase of population, extension of the water system, and the probable income and profit from the works are not admissible.

3. It is proper to consider any facts showing the nature of the land, and its adaptability for reservoir purposes; such as the area of the watershed, and amount of water, the amount of surrounding irrigable land, and the cities and towns being supplied with water from wells.

4. A witness' opinion as to the value of land should be rejected if it is based entirely on incompetent matters.

5. The introduction of irrelevant evidence on one side without objection does not justify the admission of evidence of the same character on the other side.

6. It is proper to show that a witness, who gives his opinion as to the value of the land, formerly entertained a different opinion.

7. The opinion of witnesses who have never seen the land until after the right to compensation and damages accrued should not be received.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AIKEN, Judge. Hunsaker & Britt and J. E. Deakin, for appellants. Luce, McDonald & Torrance, (Wm. F. Herrin, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is a proceeding to condemn land for reservoir purposes. On the former appeal (78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. Rep. 372) the judgment was affirmed as to all the issues except the issue as to the value of the land. The cause was remanded for a new trial of that issue, a trial was had, and a judgment on a verdict for $122,657.50 and costs of suit was entered in favor of defendants; but the plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which motion was granted, and the defendants have appealed.

It would be sufficient for us to say that as the order appealed from is one granting a new trial, and as the evidence as to the value of the land condemned is conflicting, the decision of the court below, in the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion, will not be reversed. This rule has been so many times announced, it would be a work of supererogation to cite authorities in support of it. As some of the rulings of the court below at the trial, in our opinion, were erroneous, however, we deem it advisable to refer to them for the guidance of the court at the next trial.

When the motion for a new trial was called for hearing, the defendants objected to the same being heard, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to hear or determine a question of fact as to value. The same objection, although somewhat different in form, was presented on the former appeal, and overruled. 78 Cal. 65, 20 Pac. Rep. 372. The burden of proof as to value was on the defendants. California S. R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 67 Cal. 63, 7 Pac. Rep. 123; Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 507, 23 Pac. Rep. 700. It was their duty to allege and prove the value. Both parties assumed at the trial that there was an issue as to value, the case proceeded to trial and judgment upon that assumption, and the defendants cannot now complain.

The nature of defendant's land, and its situation with respect to the reservoir of plaintiff, is shown in the opinion filed on the former appeal. 78 Cal. 66, 20 Pac. Rep. 372. It was there held that the court erred in allowing defendants to introduce evidence of value based on the fact that plaintiff's dam was already in course of construction, or upon "the circumstance that the land susceptible of irrigation from the reservoir would be enhanced in value * * * by having irrigation facilities afforded to it. * * * Where there is no actual current rate of price, and where, in consequence, the court must arrive at the value from a consideration of the uses to which the property may be put, it seems monstrous to say that the benefit arising from the proposed improvement is to be taken into consideration as an element of the value of the land." This court held that the present value of the property for prospective purposes might be given, and that it was proper, therefore, to show the value of the property for reservoir purposes, although it had never been used for such purposes. The court below, however, in its rulings and instructions at the last trial, seems to have entirely misconceived the scope and effect of our former decision. Instructions were given based upon facts so remote from the real issue in the case as to mislead the jury on the question of damages. As stated before, it was decided on the former appeal, and is the law of the case, that the value of the land for any special purpose may be taken into account as one of the elements tending to show its market value. The fact that the land is suitable for such a purpose, and a chance exists that it may some time bring an enhanced value therefor, has a tendency to increase its market value, and may properly be considered in determining what its present market value is. In this connection, it is proper to say that the learned judge who wrote the opinion in Alloway v. City of Nashville, 88 Tenn. 510, 13 S. W. Rep. 123, evidently misapprehended our decision in this case on the former appeal. We did not hold that the value of the land for reservoir purposes was a measure of damages, independent of any other consideration or element of value. On the contrary, the opinion distinctly states that the market value is to be the measure of damages, and that evidence of value for a special purpose is only to be considered as an element of the question. Neither the value in use to the plaintiff nor to the owner is to govern. Indeed, to guard against misapprehension, the court was careful to say: "The word 'value' is used in different senses. * * * For the purposes of the law of eminent domain, however, the term has reference to the value in exchange or market value. There are some cases which seem to hold that the value in use to the owner is to be taken, if it exceeds the market value. But it will generally be found, on careful examination, that such cases either relate to the damage accruing to the owner from the taking, and not to the value of the property itself, or overlook the distinction between the two things. The consensus of the best considered cases is that, for the purposes in hand, the value to be taken is the market value. * * * The problem, then, is to ascertain what is the market value. * * * From the necessity of the case, the value must be arrived at from the opinions of well-informed persons, based upon the purposes for which the property is suitable. * * * What is done is merely to take into consideration the purposes for which the property is suitable, as a means of ascertaining what reasonable purchasers would in all probability be willing to give for it; which, in a general sense, may be said to be the market value." In the Tennessee case, the court, not having the record in this case before it, fell into the error of saying that "in that case it was held that it was competent to prove the value of the land for a reservoir site, and to make that value the measure of damages, independent of any other consideration or element of value." The market value is the ultimate fact to be determined by the jury. If the land has a value for any particular purpose, its market value may be thereby enhanced. If its value for one purpose is to be excluded, why not for another? A vacant lot in a city cannot be condemned and taken at its value for agricultural purposes. If land which has been used only for pasturage contains valuable mineral deposits, it cannot be taken for public use without reference to what reasonable purchasers would, in the opinion of experts, be willing to give for it, taking into consideration the character of such deposits. The fact that the plaintiff wants the land for a particular purpose should not defeat the defendant in his efforts to show its market value by showing as an element its value for that particular purpose; and the fact that the plaintiff is the only person who has thus far offered to purchase is immaterial. The true distinction is that the demand of the plaintiff alone is not to be considered exclusive of other considerations. It goes to make up the aggregate of demands, or probable demands, which is one of the elements of the inquiry. There is nothing in what we have said inconsistent with what was decided in Gilmer v. Lime Point, 19 Cal. 47, or Railroad Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247. In the former case the defendant offered to show what the land was worth to the government as a site for fortification. As the government was the only possible purchaser for such a purpose, it was apparent that the attempt to show what it was worth for a fortification was an attempt to prove what was its peculiar value to the government. In Railroad Co. v. Pearson the defendant attempted to show what the land would be worth to the owner, provided the state should thereafter grant him a wharf franchise; and the court simply held that such a fact was too remote and speculative.

An attempt is made to distinguish a case where the owner of the land sought to be condemned occupies a commanding position from one where the land is remote from the dam-site. This contention was disposed of adversely to the appellants in the decision on the former appeal. Land which is remote from the dam-site may have a less value than land at the dam-site, but the rule governing the admissibility of evidence must necessarily be the same in each case. The question in each case is, what is its market value? and is determined by the same rules. It will not do to say that land sought to be condemned for a reservoir purpose has no value for such purpose because it is too remote from the dam-site. The very fact that this land is sought to be condemned for such a purpose is an admission of its adaptability therefor. But at the last trial the evidence was not confined to the question of the adaptability and value of the property as a reservoir-site, considered as an element in the determination of its actual or market value. Witnesses were allowed to give estimates of value based upon speculative improvements, increase of population, extension of water systems, and profits which would result from the distribution and sale of the water; thus permitting the defendants to show, practically, what plaintiff, or another in its situation, could afford to pay for the land, rather than go without it. It was admitted at the trial that "it was not practicable to have constructed a reservoir upon the 350.45 acres of land in controversy in this action except in connection with the adjoining land of the plaintiff below it, and lying between the defendant's land and the dam-site." The plaintiff had constructed a dam by which water was impounded, covering all the land below defendant's land, and, in fact, at the time of the trial, a portion of the lands in controversy. One of the witnesses (Sproul) testified on behalf of defendants that it would cost $960,000 to construct a dam, system of mains, and distributing pipes, in order to utilize the reservoir to its utmost capacity over the territory tributary to it; and that, estimating the market value of water to be $100 per acre for irrigation, and 10 cents per 1,000 gallons for domestic purposes, the value of the land in controversy was $841 per acre on January 13, 1887. He stated that in arriving at that conclusion he estimated the cost of construction of a suitable dam and mains through the lands to be irrigated; assumed that National City had a population of 2,000, and that its increase in the next 10 years would amount to 6,500; that the quantity of water would irrigate 20,000 acres of land; that it would take 10 years to complete the system, and dispose of the entire volume of water, at the rate of 2,000 acres per year; allowed $15,000 for running expenses, taxes, etc., and a sinking fund of $11,000 to renew the system at the end of 20 years; credited the reservoir for the sale of water-rights and water-rates received from National City; charged the reservoir interest at the rate of 10 per cent.; and carried the same system of debits and credits through a term of 10 years, showing a balance at the end of the tenth year of $1,623,064 after all the indebtedness had been paid. This balance he considered as the amount that would be due to the land at the end of 10 years. "The present worth of that amount, discounted at ten per cent., or if that amount had been paid at the beginning of the ten years instead of at the end, it should have been $624,225, which, divided between 742 acres of land, amounts to $841 an acre. The testimony was objected to, the objection was overruled, and plaintiff excepted. After it was admitted, the plaintiff moved the court to strike it out, on the ground that it was based upon considerations and contingencies so remote, uncertain, and speculative as to be wholly inadmissible and incompetent as a basis for fixing the market value of the land in question on the 13th day of June, 1887, or at any other time. The court denied the motion, and plaintiff excepted. Another witness (Ryan) estimated the land to be worth $600 per acre, basing his conclusion upon similar calculations and contingencies, and upon the assumption that it was to be used in connection with plaintiff's reservoir.

It is contended by appellants that the testimony of these witnesses, and other testimony of a similar nature, was admissible, because there were no similar properties in the market, by a comparison with which the market value of the property in controversy could be arrived at; that the method pursued was simply fixing the actual value by calculation,—by considering the necessary expenditure in putting it in condition for certain purposes, and the probable income and profit which would result from its use. Many cases are cited in support of this contention; among them Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403; Railroad Co. v. McGhee, 41 Ark. 202; and Railroad Co. v. Woodruff, (Ark.) 5 S. W. Rep. 792. But none of the cases cited go to the extent claimed for them. In Boom Co. v. Patterson the court said that, as a general rule, compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the lands are suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future, and that the adaptability of the land for a certain purpose is a proper element for consideration in estimating the value of the lands when appropriated for public use. There is nothing in the report of that case to show that the defendant was permitted to prove the cost of constructing the boom, and the profits which would result to the company from the use thereof. In Railroad Co. v. Woodruff, supra, the court said: "If the market value is the price for which the property could be sold on the market, we will next be led to inquire, how is the market value to be proven? This is usually done by calling witnesses who are familiar with the property, and asking their opinion as to such value. * * * When the witness has made his estimate as to the market value of the property, it is competent to support his estimate by having him describe the property, giving its location, advantages, and surroundings, though ordinarily this would be uncalled for, unless his estimate was attacked on his cross-examination, in which case the party introducing him would have ample opportunity to rebut any facts which might appear to be derogatory to his estimate. * * * We deem it proper, however, to say that the presiding judge should not suffer collateral issues to spring up and multiply, or the jury be taxed with facts and figures which could throw no appreciable light upon the question in hand, namely, the ascertainment of the market value of the property." In the case at bar the opinion of some of the witnesses was based on speculative and conjectural calculations of expenditure and profit for a period of five years', and others on a basis of ten years', use of the property in controversy, in connection with the property owned by plaintiff. The facts and figures relied on in support of these opinions not only threw no light on the question, but must have operated to confuse and mislead the minds of the jury. Of course, as was said in Boom Co. v. Patterson, it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern the appraisement of property in all cases; but it is easy and safe to pursue the course pointed out by the court in Railroad Co. v. Woodruff. Let the witnesses in direct examination state their opinion as to the market value of the property, "having regard to the existing business wants of the community, or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future," and support their estimates by a description of the property, giving its location, surroundings, and advantages for any particular use, if it have any. Opposing counsel should then be "allowed to make every inquiry touching the property which one about to buy it would feel it to his interest to make," and for the information of the jury, and to test the value of the opinion given, be permitted the widest latitude in cross-examination. The following authorities establish the proposition that the compensation to be awarded the owner of the land condemned cannot be based upon the value of the property to the person or company in charge of the public use, nor by its necessities, and that it is not proper to take into consideration the profits which may result from the use of the land, especially where the profits depend upon the expenditure of large sums of money in carrying out the contemplated enterprise: Canal Co. v. Archer, 9 Gill. & J. 481; Gardner v. Inhabitants of Brookline, 127 Mass. 358; Burt v. Wigglesworth, 117 Mass. 302; Railroad Co. v. Balthasar, (Pa.) 17 Atl. Rep. 518; Dorian v. Railroad Co., 46 Pa. St. 520; Railroad Co. v. Galgiani, 49 Cal. 139.

Appellants contend that the court did not err in refusing to strike out the testimony objected to, because the witnesses were competent to express an opinion as to value, and the reasons for such opinion can only affect the weight to be given to their testimony; but we think that where a witness bases his opinion entirely upon incompetent and inadmissible matters, or shows that such matters are the chief elements in the calculations which lead him to such conclusions, it should be rejected altogether. Railroad Co. v. Balthasar, (Pa.) 13 Atl. Rep. 294. It clearly appears that the witnesses referred to based their estimate of the value of the property upon an anticipated investment of a large amount of money in an extensive system of water-works, and founded their opinion largely upon hypothetical expenditures and receipts of money, and an increased demand for water. The court, too, adopted the same erroneous rules, and under its instructions the jury must have found such price as in the opinion of the witnesses the land might bring, or probably would bring, at some future period, if plaintiff or another in its situation should extend the works as contemplated by the witnesses.

It is claimed by the appellants that the plaintiff ought not to be heard to complain of the ruling of the court in admitting the testimony referred to, because its own witnesses had given testimony of the same character; but, as was said when the case was here before, "the introduction of irrelevant evidence upon one side without objection does not justify the introduction of irrelevant evidence upon the other side." See, also, Walkup v. Pratt, 5 Har. & J. 58. But, if the ruling of the court could be sustained for the reasons urged, the court in some of its instructions to the jury, as stated before, adopted the same rules as those followed by the witnesses in their testimony. The court instructed the jury, at the request of defendant, that, in considering the weight to be given to the opinions of witnesses as to the value of the land for reservoir purposes, they might take into consideration, among other things, the character and capacity of the works necessary and proper for the utilization of the defendants' land for reservoir purposes; the quality and condition of the lands irrigable from the reservoir; the need of such lands for irrigation in order to make them habitable and productive, together with the needs of the inhabitants of cities and towns within reach of this system of water-works, and appearing on the 13th of June, 1887, to be dependent upon it for water; the proportion which the defendants' land bears to the remainder of the plaintiff's reservoir; the quantity of water, the storage of which is secured by the use of the defendants' land in connection with the adjoining land of plaintiff or other persons, and the value of such water as a salable commodity in the neighborhood tributary to this reservoir on the 13th day of June, 1887; also, that in considering the value of the land for reservoir purposes, as a guide to ascertaining its market value, the question was not what it was worth to plaintiff, as owner of the remainder of the reservoir and dam-site, in June, 1887, doing business as they proposed to do, but it is, what was it worth to any reasonable person, able and willing to buy, and intending to acquire by purchase for condemnation the dam-site and the remainder of the reservoir, and to use the whole for supplying water for public use over the territory tributary to this system? that the jury had a right to consider, if it be a fact, the proximity of the land to an eligible dam-site, and its availability for reservoir purposes, in connection with such dam-site and other adjacent lands.

The court had fairly and fully instructed the jury, at the request of plaintiff, on the subject of value; but these instructions, given at the request of the defendants, were erroneous, because they, in effect, indorsed the methods of calculation employed by the defendants' witnesses, and informed the jury—at least the jury undoubtedly so understood it—that they might find the value to be what the land was worth to the plaintiff, or another in its situation, and that this might be determined by a calculation of the probable profits from sales of water and water-rights at prospective prices. The cost of works necessary for the utilization of the land for reservoir purposes was an element in the calculation as conjectural and speculative as would be the cost of a railroad, and rolling stock necessary for the operation thereof, in fixing the value of land condemned for railroad purposes. The quality and condition of the lands to be affected was as foreign to a legitimate estimate of the market value of the land as the size and growth of a city on the line of the railroad would be in fixing the value of land taken for railroad purposes. The necessities of the public are never taken into consideration in fixing the value. They are an element which must be proved before the land can be taken, but are never an element of the question as to compensation. The proportion which the defendants' land bore to the remainder of the plaintiff's reservoir, and the quantity of water which would be stored by use of the defendants' land in connection with the land of plaintiff, and the value of the water as a salable commodity, were clearly improper elements to be considered. Canal Co. v. Archer, and other cases, supra. The question was not what the property was worth to a person intending to acquire it and the dam-site and the remainder of the reservoir by purchase or condemnation for the purpose of supplying water over the territory tributary to the system, but what was the market value of the property itself; in other words, what the defendants could have obtained for their land if it had been offered for sale in the market, a reasonable time being given within which to make the sale. The plaintiff must compete in the market with bona fide purchasers generally, but its necessities cannot be taken advantage of. So far as the value of the land in controversy may have been increased to purchasers generally by the construction and use of the plaintiff's dam and reservoir, or as a part of the entire reservoir-site, such fact should be considered; but the value of the land when used in connection with the plaintiff's land cannot be taken as a criterion, for this would be taking the value to the plaintiff as the measure of compensation. The jury had a right to consider the fact, in determining the market value, that the land in controversy was in proximity to a dam-site, and to consider its adaptability for reservoir purposes, and to determine whether or not its market value had been enhanced by improvements put upon adjoining property; but for the reasons stated its adaptability for reservoir purposes should not have been considered "in connection with such dam-site and other adjacent lands."

Respondent has requested a decision on every one of the 17 assignments of error in the statement; but, in view of what we have said regarding the rulings of the court and the instructions, it seems unnecessary to do so. It is sufficient to say that any facts showing the nature of the land in controversy, and its adaptability for reservoir purposes, may be shown. The area of the water-shed and amount of water were matters proper to be considered; for a reservoir would be useless without water. That there was land irrigable from the reservoir, and cities and towns which were being supplied with water from wells, were matters not only tending to show that it was a practical reservoir-site, but bearing directly upon its value. The condition of the property, the uses to which it may be put, having regard to the existing advantages for making a practical use of the property, and such advantages as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future, are all matters for consideration in estimating the value of the lands, (Boom Co. v. Patterson, supra;) but to attempt to ascertain the value by estimating the cost of works necessary for its use for a particular purpose, the cost of operation, prospective sales, and estimated profits, increased demands through growth of population, etc., requires "a degree of refinement in the measure of values which seems to us totally incompatible with the gross estimates of common life. * * * The gross estimates of common life are all that courts and juries have skill enough to use as a measure of value. All other measures are necessarily arbitrary and fanciful." Searle v. Railroad Co., 33 Pa. St. 64.

The court did not err in overruling plaintiff's objection to the question asked Mr. Schuyler during his cross-examination. It was proper to show that he had at some prior time entertained a different opinion as to the value of the property.

Some of the witnesses on both sides never saw the land in controversy until several years after the date of the summons, at which time the right to compensation and damages accrued. We think their opinions ought not to have been received.

We think that the company should pay the costs of this proceeding, on account of the manner in which it opened and proved its case at the last trial. Section 1255 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "costs may be allowed or not, and, if allowed, may be apportioned between the parties on the same or adverse sides, in the discretion of the court." Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, (section 559,) in speaking of the question of costs, says: "It seems to us that courts should be guided by the following principles and considerations in the matter: By the constitution, the owner is entitled to just compensation for his property taken for public use. He is entitled to receive this compensation before the property is taken or his possession disturbed. If the parties cannot agree upon the amount, it must be ascertained in the manner provided by law. As the property cannot be taken until the compensation is paid, and as it cannot be paid until it is ascertained, the duty of ascertaining the amount is necessarily cast upon the party seeking to condemn the property; and he should pay all the expenses which attach to the process. Any law which casts this burden upon the owner should, in our opinion, be held to be unconstitutional and void. * * * If the statute gives the condemning party a right of appeal, it cannot cast the costs upon the owner, even if the assessment is reduced." See, also, In re New York, W. S. & B. R. Co., 94 N. Y. 287. Whatever may be the constitutional rights of the parties, we think in this case, under section 1255, that it will be a proper exercise of discretion to require the company to pay costs. The order is affirmed, and the court below is directed to tax the costs of the last trial and of this appeal against the plaintiff.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that there was such a conflict of evidence on the question of value as to warrant the order directing a new trial, but I do not think the superior court erred in ruling upon the motions to strike out testimony, or in its instructions to the jury.

HARRON v. CITY OF LONDON FIRE INS. CO.
(No. 13,754.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 12, 1891.)

VERBAL CONTRACT OF INSURANCE.

An insurance agent's commission certified that he had full power to receive proposals for insurance, fix rates of premiums, and receive money, subject to the company's rules and regulations, and such instructions as might be given from time to time by its general agent. The lessee of an hotel made a verbal agreement of insurance with the agent, who stated that a formal application was not necessary. The company, prior thereto, had written policies on the building, and its general manager had written the agent that he would give his attention to any insurance required on the hotel and contents, and upon another occasion that he would take the whole line, and place it in such companies as was specially desired. Held, that this was sufficient to support a finding that the agent was authorized to make the contract.

Jarhoe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellant. Haggin & Van Ness, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover $5,000 upon an alleged verbal contract for the insurance of furniture, etc., in the Southern Hotel, at Bakersfield, in Kern county. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of Great Britain, and does business in the Pacific states and territories under the management of W. J. Callingham, and its head office under his charge is in San Francisco. It has local agents in various cities and towns, and on July 6, 1889, its agent at Bakersfield was, and for a long time had been, H. A. Blodget. On that date a small fire occurred in the Southern Hotel, of which plaintiff was lessee, and in which she had a large amount of furniture and other personal property. The hotel was conducted and managed by her brother, W. H. Harron, who was her general agent for that purpose. Being alarmed at the occurrence of the fire her said agent went to said Blodget in the afternoon of said July 6th, and told him that he wanted an insurance on said furniture, etc., to take effect immediately, and that if he could not obtain it from him he would go elsewhere; and it is clear that the jury were warranted by the evidence in finding that a contract of insurance on said property for one year for $5,000 was then and there made by defendant with plaintiff, to take effect immediately, provided Blodget had the authority to make such contract for defendant. On the next day, July 7th, a general conflagration, not originating in said hotel, destroyed nearly the entire town, including plaintiff's said property, which was of a value exceeding $5,000. The real question in the case is, was the jury authorized by the evidence to find that Blodget had power to bind the defendant? There are some minor points made about certain rulings of the court, but we do not think that in such rulings any material error was committed.

Blodget had a written commission from defendant, which certifies that he is appointed agent of defendant "with full power to receive proposals for insurance against loss or damage by fire in Bakersfield and vicinity, to fix rates of premium, and to receive moneys, on behalf of the City of London Fire Insurance Company, Limited, of London, Eng., subject to the rules and regulations of said company, and such instructions as may be given from time to time by the general agents of the western department of the United States." The foregoing words in quotation marks are the only words in the instrument which either grant or restrict the powers of Blodget. Appellant contends that Blodget's powers must be determined by the commission, and that it does not include the power to accept applications, or to make any insurance contracts; while counsel for respondent contends that such power is fairly included in the language of the instrument. We do not think it necessary to determine whether the general scope of the commission, properly construed, includes the authority here questioned, because we think that in this particular case there were "such instructions * * * given * * * by the general agents" of defendant as authorized Blodget to make the contract sued on. Harron testified that at the time of the contract he asked Blodget, "Don't I want to make a written application?" and was answered, "No; you are not asking for this insurance. You are giving it to Mr. Callingham upon his asking for it. * * * I have letters from Mr. Callingham asking for that insurance; consequently it is not necessary for you to make a written application." Blodget testified that "I told him [Harron] that I could furnish him insurance; that Mr. Callingham had asked for the insurance on the furniture of the hotel; that I had promised to give it to him, and that I would send it to him; and that it would cover from then." Furthermore, it appears in evidence that defendant had taken policies on the Southern Hotel; that on April 11, 1889, in a letter to Blodget about those policies, Callingham wrote as follows: "I dropped you a line yesterday asking if there would be some insurance required on the hotel furniture and other contents of the building. * * * If any insurance is required as suggested, I shall be very glad to give my attention to it;" and that on April 10th he had written to Blodget as follows: "If the furniture of the Southern Hotel is to be insured, I could take care of the whole line for you, and would place it in any companies that you specially desire." We think that this testimony and evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in finding that Blodget had authority to make the contract with plaintiff, and that he did make it on behalf of defendant. There is no pretense that a written policy embracing the oral contract would not have been made, of the date of July 6th, if the fire had not taken place before it could have been done. Callingham, when on the witness stand, did not pretend that there was any other reason for rejecting the policy. There is nothing in the point that the plaintiff's brother and manager of the hotel, W. H. Harron, had no authority to act for plaintiff. Judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial affirmed.

LUCO v. TORO. (No. 12,566.)

APPEAL—DIVIDED COURT—AFFIRMANCE.

Const. Cal. art. 6, § 2, provides that the supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and six associate justices, and the concurrence of four justices present at the argument shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment in bank, but if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment, then all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall hear the argument; but to render a judgment a concurrence of four judges shall be necessary. On motion to affirm a judgment it appeared that the cause had been several times heard and submitted, in which no decision was reached owing to the change in the personnel of the court, and an equal division of opinion among the judges qualified to act; but before an opinion was written three new judges qualified to hear the case were selected. Held, that the cause should be presented on its merits before the newly constituted court, and the motion will be denied.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; THOMAS H. BUSH, Judge.

Const. Cal. Jud. Dept. § 2, provides that the supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and six associate justices, and the concurrence of four justices present at the argument shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment in bank, but if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment, then all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall hear the argument; but to render a judgment a concurrence of four judges shall be necessary.

I. N. Thorne and E. W. McKinstry, (Oliver P. Evans, of counsel,) for appellant. Harry L. Titus and Henry M. Smith, (George H. Smith, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. When this cause was first submitted the judgment of the court below was affirmed, four justices concurring. One of the justices who participated in the decision was not present at the argument, but it was understood by the members of the court at the time of the decision referred to that counsel for both parties had stipulated at the hearing—as counsel had in nearly every other case on the calendar for the term at which this case was heard—that any justice not present at the argument might participate in the decision. Upon a representation made by counsel for appellant, after the decision, that no such stipulation had been entered into, and upon their motion, based on the ground that only three of the justices who heard the argument had participated in the decision, the judgment was set aside. Since that time the cause has been heard and submitted several times, but no decision has been reached, owing to a change in the personnel of the court, and an equal division of opinion among the six justices qualified to act. At the last October term counsel for respondent moved that the judgment be affirmed, it appearing that the justices qualified to act were equally divided in opinion. It is admitted that a mere failure to agree cannot have the effect, ipso facto, of an affirmance, for the constitution requires the concurrence of four justices to pronounce judgment; but it is claimed that it then becomes the duty of the justices who voted for a reversal to unite with their associates in affirming the judgment. The reason given for this contention is an argument ab inconvenienti. It is said that if this rule is not followed the case might be continued for four years, until a change in the membership in the court occurs; "and, then again, the same condition of things might still continue, and this would require a further continuance; and thus it might happen that the case would never be decided." Many English and American authorities are cited in support of the motion, and no cases to the contrary have been found by respondent; but the decisions must be read in the light of the circumstances under which they were rendered. Some of the cases referred to went off on the authority of statutes providing that in cases of equal division among the judges the judgment should be affirmed, others upon a rule following the practice of the English courts, and the others upon the ground of expediency. The case of Ayers v. Bensley, 32 Cal. 632, is hardly in point. There a judgment had been rendered by a constitutional quorum, and it was only on petition for rehearing that a division occurred. The rule has always been with respect to petitions for rehearings that as many justices as are necessary to pronounce the judgment must concur in granting a rehearing, or the petition will be denied. In jurisdictions presided over by judges holding for life, or for terms so great as to make the probability of a change in the membership of the court remote, the judgment of affirmance follows a division ex necessitate rei. In such a case the decree does not import a division as to the nature of the judgment, but as to the questions of law and fact involved in it. While the decree is a bar to any subsequent action for the same cause, no matters of law are decided, and it therefore possesses no dignity as a judicial precedent, but carries upon its face a badge which precludes any application of it in future under the doctrine of stare decisis. The judges simply agree that it is expedient to finish the litigation. It is a public expediency, and is often expedient also with respect to the interests of the parties. Supported by these considerations, and the presumption of correctness which always attaches to the judgment of the court below, it is proper and right that the judges who were in favor of a reversal should waive any insistence of opinion, and unite with their associates in an affirmance of the judgment. This they do without in any way relinquishing their convictions upon the questions of law or fact involved in the case. But here there are no such considerations as induced the decisions in the cases referred to. At the time the motion was made it was evident that before the time for the next term of court at which the cause would be heard, three, at least,—including the justice disqualified to act,—and possibly four, of the justices, would be succeeded by others on the bench. Within a month after the motion was made, and before an opinion was written, an election occurred, which resulted in the choice of three new justices, all of whom are qualified to assist in deciding the cause on its merits. Under these circumstances, we thought at the time the motion was submitted, and still think, that the cause should be presented on its merits before the court as now constituted. The motion is therefore denied.

We concur BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J

HARRISON, DE HAVEN, and GAROUTTE, JJ. Although we were not present at the argument of the motion, which was afterwards submitted on briefs, counsel for appellant not being present at the time the motion was made, we have considered the point made by respondent, and concur in the views expressed in the opinion of Justice PATERSON.

STATE ex rel. KELLOGG, Attorney General,
v. KANSAS MERCANTILE ASS'N et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Feb. 7, 1891.)

1. A scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance is a "lottery."

2. A scheme, generally known as "playing policy," whereby an association sells for five cents, or any other specific sum of money, certificates or tickets which entitle the purchaser to a lead-pencil of trifling value, and also permits such purchaser to select certain numbers, say 3-9-13, which, if all drawn by a blindfolded boy from a revolving wheel in which several numbers are placed, entitle the person purchasing the certificate or ticket to a prize of money much larger in amount than he has paid for his certificate or ticket, is a "lottery."

S. B. Bradford, for defendant.

HORTON, C. J. This action is brought under subdivisions 3 and 4 of paragraph 4767 of the General Statutes of 1889. It has for its object the forfeiture of the charter of the Kansas Mercantile Association, and the prevention of the individual defendants from acting as a corporation or exercising corporate rights. The charter states that the purpose for which the corporation was formed is to sell various articles of merchandise, with premium numbers attached, the premium numbers entitling purchasers holding the same to a selection of other articles. The testimony of P. W. Kline, the general manager of the association, shows that the object in obtaining the charter was to enable the association to carry on the identical business which the evidence discloses is carried on by the association. The testimony of witnesses shows that the association has on hand a number of lead-pencils, probably of the value of a small fraction of a cent; that a five-cent investment or a dollar investment in the purchase of one of the "vendor's certificates," as the defendants are pleased to call their tickets, entitles the purchaser to one of these lead-pencils; that the purchaser of a certificate or ticket selects certain numbers, say 3-9-13, and hands these numbers into the office of the association, and, if all the same numbers come out in the next drawing, the purchaser gets a prize, ranging from 45 cents to $2,500; if the numbers selected do not come out, the purchaser gets no prize; that twice a day 78 numbers are placed in a wheel on the stage of Hanson's Opera-House at Kansas City, in this state; that the wheel is revolved for half an hour; that a blindfolded boy draws out 12 numbers at a noon drawing, and 13 numbers at an evening drawing; that such persons as choose to be present at these drawings attend and make up the audience; that the numbers drawn are posted on a black-board, and are sent to the various agencies in Atchison, Wichita, Leavenworth, St. Joseph, Mo., and two or three points in Texas, where the association has agencies established for the purpose of assisting in carrying on its business. The business of the association is called, and generally known, as, "playing policy."

Section 3, art. 15, of the constitution of the state, ordains that "lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets are forever prohibited." Of course, there is no provision in the statute concerning private corporations authorizing the formation of any corporation or association in this state to carry on lotteries or to sell lottery tickets. Paragraph 4767, Gen. St. 1889, reads:

"Such action [in the nature of quo warranto] may be brought in the supreme court or in the district court in the following cases: * * * Third, when any association or number of persons shall act within the state as a corporation without being legally incorporated; fourth, when any corporation do or admit acts which amount to a surrender or forfeiture of their rights and privileges as a corporation, or when any corporation abuses its power, or exercises powers not conferred by law." Upon the pleadings and evidence, the sole question is whether the business carried on by the Kansas Mercantile Association is a lottery. The word "lottery" must be construed in the popular sense, with a view of remedying the mischief intended to be prevented, and to suppress all evasions for the continuance of the mischief. A "gift-sale" of books is a lottery. State v. Clarke, 33 N. H. 329. A "prize-candy" business is a lottery. Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424; Holoman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 610. "Prize-concerts" are lotteries. Com. v. Thacher, 97 Mass. 583; State v. Overton, 16 Nev. 136; Nexley v. Devlin, 12 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 210. "Prize-tickets" to induce subscriptions to a newspaper constitute a lottery. State v. Mumford, 73 Mo. 647. "Raffles" at fairs are lotteries. Com. v. Manderfield, 8 Phila. 459. "Drawing works of art" constitutes a lottery. Governors of Alms-House v. Art Union, 7 N. Y. 228. "A public exhibition during which, and as a part of the advertised proceedings, presents were distributed among such of the audience as held tickets which answered to the numbers called at will by the exhibitor, held to be a lottery." State v. Shorts, 32 N. J. Law, 398. "When a city or a government, in order to make an inducement for people to buy their bonds, holds out large prizes to be drawn by chance, or determined by lot in the manner in which prizes are usually determined in honestly conducted lotteries, the mailing of circulars concerning such drawings, past and future, is a mailing of lottery circulars." U. S. v. Zeisler, 30 Fed. Rep. 499. "A scheme for the disposal of town lots, by the terms of which a number of lots are sold, and others are reserved to be distributed by lot among the purchasers of the first portion, so that the chance of obtaining one of the reserved prize lots forms a part of the inducement or consideration for which each purchaser pays the price agreed on for the lot sold to him, is a 'lottery.'" U. S. v. Olney, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 275. "Playing policy" has also been decided in New York to be a "lottery." Wilkinson v. Gill, 74 N. Y. 63. In that case, Church, C. J., said that "a 'lottery' is defined by Webster, 'a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance, or the distribution itself,' and he defines 'lot' as 'that which causes, falls, or happens; that which in human speech is called chance, fortune, hazard;'" and "to draw lots" is "to determine an event by drawing one thing from a number, whose marks are concealed from the drawer, and thus determining an event." Worcester defines "lottery" as "a hazard in which sums are ventured for a chance of obtaining a greater value." The language of FOLGER, J., in Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424, may be adopted as a result of the accepted definitions: "Where a pecuniary consideration is paid, and it is determined by lot or chance, according to some scheme held out to the public, what and how much he who pays the money is to have for it, that is a lottery." Clearly, the business in which the association is engaged is "a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance." It has all the essential features of a lottery, and should be so construed. A purchaser of a certificate or ticket from the association does so with the hope or expectation of drawing a prize. His purpose is to try his luck at "Fortune's Wheel," and not to get a lead-pencil. Within the definition of Webster and the authorities cited, the purpose of the association and its officers and agents is to establish and carry on a lottery. The purpose expressed in the charter of the association shows that purchasers of merchandise from the association, with premium numbers, were to be entitled to the selection of other articles; that is, prizes. Therefore it is evident that the parties filing the charter and organizing the association intended to carry on "a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance;" that is, to establish "a lottery." This is unlawful. Such a scheme or business has no warrant of authority from any statute, and is in direct violation of the constitution of the state. Even if there is no statute prescribing fines or penalties to be inflicted upon persons engaged in carrying on lotteries in the state, yet the constitution is so far self-executing that no charter can be granted or corporation organized in the state for lottery business or the sale of lottery tickets. The alleged charter of the defendant will therefore be declared null and void, and all of the defendants are hereby prohibited from transacting or carrying on the business or "lottery" described in the petition. Judgment will be entered accordingly against the defendants, with costs. All the justices concurring.

JUDGE—DISQUALIFICATION—BENEFIT OF COMPLAINT—COMPROMISE.

1. The part ownership of a mine by the brother of the judge before whom an action involving a lease of part of the property is about to be tried does not of itself disqualify the judge, where there is nothing to show that the brother's interest was covered by the lease, or in any way affected thereby; and, where the judge is of opinion that he will not be influenced by that fact, his order overruling plaintiff's application for a change of venue will not be disturbed.

2. Neither is the judge disqualified by the fact that his brother is an attorney for one of the parties in the case, and that the judge himself was an unsuccessful bidder for a lease of the mine.

3. Where the complaint in the action is based on the theory that an assignment of the lease to plaintiff correctly expresses the contract of the parties, and that defendants have wrongfully availed themselves of a clause of forfeiture therein contained, the refusal of the court to permit an amended complaint to be filed on the day before the cause was set for hearing, which disaffirms the correctness of the assignment as written, and which prays that it be so reformed as to omit entirely the forfeiture clause, is not such an abuse of discretion as will warrant a reversal.

4. A party cannot be compelled, against his will, to testify as to the details of an offer of compromise made by him during the pendency of the litigation.

5. A written offer of compromise, made by one of defendants, and rejected by plaintiff, is not rendered admissible against the latter by the fact that he read it without specifically objecting to matters therein prejudicial to his case.

6. Where defendant testifies to a conversation with plaintiff, which discredits the latter's testimony, the refusal to permit defendant to be fully cross-examined as to such conversation is error.

Appeal from district court, Pitkin county. This action was instituted by appellant Lucien L. Patrick, as plaintiff below, against appellees, George W. Crowe et al., to procure a decree declaring plaintiff to be the owner of a half interest in a lease upon an eleven-twelfths interest in the "Celeste" lode, a mining claim situate in Pitkin county, Colo. In the month of April, 1888, the Celeste claim was owned by the following parties, to-wit: Charles H. Graham, Meyer Guggenheim, John A. Ewing, and A. W. Rucker; the latter being one of the attorneys of record for appellees in this cause. About this date the aforesaid parties, with the exception of said Rucker, they then owning eleven-twelfths of the property, being desirous of having the same worked under lease, advertised for bids for a lease upon the property. In response to such advertisement bids were put in by a number of parties, among whom were George W. Crowe, one of the present appellees, Hon. T. A. Rucker, the judge who afterwards presided at the trial of the cause in the court below, E. R. Holden and Benjamin Guggenheim, jointly, and others. E. R. Holden and Benjamin Guggenheim were the successful bidders, and a lease was thereafter duly executed to them. It is unnecessary to state the terms of this lease further than to say that it provided for the working of the mine under the royalty system for the period of 18 months, and that it required the lessees to keep at least two men at work upon the property, and that a failure so to do for a period of 10 days would entitle the lessors to declare the lease forfeited. Shortly thereafter Holden and Guggenheim executed to George W. Crowe, one of the appellees herein, a sublease upon a three-fourths interest in the property. A few days after the execution of this sublease the following written contract was entered into in relation thereto between appellee Crowe, as party of the first part, and L. L. Patrick and Mrs. William F. Patrick, parties of the second part, viz.: "This deed of assignment and agreement, combined, made this 23d day of April, 1888, by George W. Crowe, of the county of Arapahoe and state of Colorado, of the first part, and Lucien L. Patrick and Mrs. William F. Patrick, of the county of Lake and state of Colorado, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of one hundred and sixty-six dollars, sixty-six and two-thirds cents, lawful money, to the party of the first part in hand paid by the parties of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby confessed, and in further consideration of the sum of money hereinafter mentioned, to be paid and expended as hereinafter expressed, and in further consideration of each and all the covenants and agreements hereinafter expressed, to be kept and performed by the parties of the second part, the party of the first part has sold, assigned, transferred, and set over, and by these presents does sell, assign, transfer, and set over, unto Lucien L. Patrick an undivided  $\frac{1}{2}$ , and unto the said Mrs. William F. Patrick an undivided  $\frac{1}{2}$  interest in a certain lease of the Celeste lode mining claim, situate in the Roaring Fork mining district, in Pitkin county, and state of Colorado; the said indenture of lease bearing date the first day of April, A. D. 1888, and being for the term of eighteen months from the date thereof; said lease being originally executed to Benjamin Guggenheim and E. R. Holden; to have and to hold the same unto them, their heirs, executors, and assigns, with the privilege thereunto belonging. The parties of the second part, in consideration of the foregoing assignment and transfer, agree to expend within the period of sixty days from the date hereof, in working said mine and developing the same for ore and ore bodies, the sum of one thousand dollars: provided, however, that the proceeds of all ore taken from said mine and sold during the said period of sixty days, shall be applied to the payment of the expenses incurred in working the same; and if, on account of the application of the proceeds of the sales of ore taken and sold from said mine during said period of sixty days, the sum of one thousand dollars shall not have been wholly expended as aforesaid during said period, then the parties of the second part agree to refund to the party of the first part the one-third of such unexpended balance of said sum of one thousand dollars on request of the party of the first part. It is further agreed that in case the said sum of one thousand dollars shall be wholly expended within the mine without the mine producing enough ore to pay the expenses thereof, then the parties of the second part agree to be responsible for and pay the two-thirds part of all expenses of every kind incurred in working said mine, over and above the proceeds of ore taken therefrom, it being understood that the proceeds of ore taken from said mine shall be first used in paying the expenses of working the same. The party of the first part hereby reserves to himself equal authority and voice in the management of said property with the parties of the second part. It is further agreed between the parties hereto that no salary or salaries shall be paid for superintending or managing the working of said property until the same is on a paying basis. The parties of the second part hereby agree to keep, abide by, and perform all the conditions, covenants, and agreements expressed in said lease of said mine, to the full extent of their respective interests therein; and in case of the failure of the parties of the second part, or either of them, to keep and perform each and all the agreements and covenants herein expressed, he, she, or they, as the case may be, shall forfeit his, her, or their interest in said lease, and the same shall immediately revert to the party of the first part. In witness whereof, the parties have hereto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. [Signed] GEO. W. CROWE. L. L. PATRICK. MRS. WILLIAM F. PATRICK." The foregoing is the instrument set forth and relied upon in the original complaint, in which pleading it is further alleged that the contract was entered into by L. L. Patrick on his own behalf and as agent for Mrs. W. F. Patrick, and that, Mrs. Patrick failing to take the portion assigned to her, plaintiff succeeded to said interest. Continuing, the plaintiff alleges that he had expended and become liable for the sum of \$1,000 prior to the 10th day of July, 1888, in prosecuting the work under the written agreement, and the letting of the contract for the sinking of a shaft upon said property to the depth of 100 feet at a cost of \$9.50 per foot, the sinking of the shaft to the depth of 50 feet, and the suspension of further work on account of water, and Crowe's acquiescence in such suspension, the keeping of two men at work thereafter to prevent forfeiture of lien. The familiarity of Ellis with these arrangements is also alleged, and he is made a party defendant. It is also stated that Crowe and Ellis conspired together to bring about a forfeiture of the contract, and that they did take possession of the mine, and work the same at a large profit. So far as the answer to this complaint need be noticed, it consists of a specific denial of each allegation of the complaint, except the agreement of the 23d of April, and as to such agreement it alleges failure on the part of the plaintiff to carry out its terms, and his abandonment of the enterprise; also the subsequent declaration and claim of forfeiture and transfer of a three-eighths interest in the contract by Crowe to defendant Gilbert.

The action was originally commenced in the district court of Arapahoe county. The defendants, however, asked for a change of venue to Pitkin county, resting their motion for that purpose upon the ground that the subject-matter of the controversy was situated there. This motion was resisted by plaintiff on the alleged ground that A. W. Rucker was an owner in the Celeste lode, and that Thomas A. Rucker, the judge of the district court of Pitkin county, was also interested in said property. To these allegations the defendants replied, with affidavits of G. W. Crowe and A. W. Rucker, showing that the latter had never leased his interest in the mine, had no interest in the lease, and that Thomas A. Rucker had neither an interest in the property or lease. The venue was changed in accordance with the motion. A. W. Rucker had not, however, up to this time entered his appearance as an attorney for the defendant in the cause. On the 18th of March, 1888, in the district court of Pitkin county, plaintiff in turn petitioned for a change of venue. This petition, in addition to the claim of interest of the Ruckers, asserted, among other things, that the judge would be influenced against plaintiff on account of A. W. Rucker being one of the attorneys for defendants; that said attorney, in conversation with T. J. O'Donnell, attorney for plaintiff, had expressed a strong interest in the controversy prior to his being employed in the case; that the judge had been a bidder for a lease on the Celeste, and that his failure to secure the same was in part caused by plaintiff, that one Balderson, a brother-in-law of Crowe, and editor of the Aspen Times, had published an article in said paper about the matters in controversy in the suit, for the purpose of influencing the decision. In reply, an affidavit was made and filed by A. W. Rucker, again stating his relation to the property, and averring that he had no interest in the subject-matter of the suit; and also accounting for the interest he may have exhibited in the conversation with O'Donnell, by the claim that he had ascertained that Crowe was looking for him on the day of the conversation, and that he expected to be employed by Crowe, and he had so informed O'Donnell. The petition for change of venue was denied. The cause was set for hearing on the 11th of July following. On the 8th of July, notice was given by plaintiff of his intention to move for leave to file an amended complaint. On the 10th of July a motion was made by plaintiff to be allowed to file an amended complaint. The motion was supported by the affidavit of his attorney, setting forth certain reasons why the complaint, as amended, setting up the alleged true cause of action, was not filed in the first instance. The reasons given, in substance, were that at the time of preparing the original complaint the attorney for the plaintiff had not seen the original correspondence between plaintiff and Crowe, and did not know that the same was in existence at the time. Affiant further stated that on account of other pressing business he did not prepare the original complaint as carefully as the importance of the case demanded; that he was compelled to dictate the complaint direct to a type-writer; that he "supposed, as a matter of law, and so advised plaintiff, that all that had occurred between himself and plaintiff was in law merged in said paper of April 23d; that he, at the time, had not given said question of law the same consideration he had since," and on account of press of business, and sickness followed by a death in his family, he was prevented from preparing the amended complaint at an earlier date. The amended complaint tendered, in substance, alleges that plaintiff and defendant Crowe, about the 1st of March, 1888, entered into an agreement by which Crowe was to attempt to get this lease for their joint and equal benefit; that the lease was awarded to Holden and Guggenheim, and, before the lease was actually made, Crowe entered into negotiations with Holden and Guggenheim for the assignment, and about the 22d of March, plaintiff and Crowe agreed to take the assignment from Holden and Guggenheim of three-fourths interest in the lease; that such assignment was made to Crowe, but for the joint and equal benefit of plaintiff and himself; that afterwards, Crowe, being in embarrassed circumstances, proposed selling plaintiff an additional one-eighth interest for $500; that plaintiff was inexperienced, and without any considerable money, but, being desirous of assisting Crowe, offered to negotiate the sale of the one-eighth interest to Mrs. W. F. Patrick; that the negotiations resulted in the sale to her; that "they undertook to have their agreement reduced to writing;" that the result was the agreement of the 23d of April, which did not express the true relations of the parties, etc.; the commencement and subsequent suspension of work because of water was alleged, and the acquiescence of Crowe in such suspension; the keeping of men at work by plaintiff thereafter in response to requirements of the lease; and the expenditure of $1,000 by him under the lease. In this pleading plaintiff also states that he attempted to make arrangements with the owners of the adjoining claims, the Lottie and the Justice, to work the Celeste through their shafts. Plaintiff further alleges that he was called to Denver on the 8th of July, leaving the defendant Ellis to act for him in his absence; that Ellis, instead of doing this, conspired with Crowe to bring about a declaration of forfeiture, well knowing plaintiff's rights in the lease; and the taking of possession by Ellis and Crowe of the mine after the 10th of July, and the profitable working thereafter of the mine by them under the lease. The court refused to allow the amended complaint to be filed, and the cause was tried upon the original complaint and answer. When the case was reached for trial the court, on its own motion, and against appellant's protest, called a jury to determine certain questions of fact. The jury, however, returned answers favorable to the plaintiff. Notwithstanding this, a judgment was given in the defendants' favor, the findings of the jury having been first set aside by the court.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first question to be considered under the assignments of error relates to the refusal of the district judge of Pitkin county to change the venue upon appellant's petition and affidavit. The application is based upon the alleged prejudice of the presiding judge, the Hon. T. A. RUCKER, against the appellant. As grounds for such prejudice it is alleged, in substance: (1) That A. W. Rucker, a brother of said judge, is one of the owners of the Celeste lode. (2) That said A. W. Rucker is one of the attorneys of record for the defendants in this cause, and is interested in defeating plaintiff's claim. (3) That the feelings and interest of A. W. Rucker, and his appearance in the case as counsel, will have an influence upon the said Judge Rucker's judgment, to the prejudice of plaintiff's rights. (4) That the judge was himself an unsuccessful bidder for the lease under which both claim in this action. (5) The recent publication of an article in a certain newspaper published at the place where the court was being held, for the purpose, as it is said, of influencing the decision of the judge in this cause. Upon this showing plaintiff was not entitled to a change of venue as a matter of right; for, although it is alleged that A. W. Rucker was at the time one of the owners of the Celeste, it is not shown that his interest was covered by the lease in controversy, or in any way affected thereby. That he was an attorney in this case did not, of itself, render his brother, the judge, incompetent to try the action. That as such attorney he might have an influence upon the determination of the case, may be admitted; and yet this influence might arise entirely from his skill in conducting the defense as an attorney, and be wholly proper. And the fact that the judge was an unsuccessful bidder for a lease upon the property would not entitle plaintiff to a change of venue. As to the newspaper article, it is not at all probable that the judge could have been influenced thereby. We cannot, therefore, say that the matters alleged, singly or together, show that Judge RUCKER was disqualified from presiding at the trial. He was the person called upon to decide as to whether or not for any reason his judgment might be unduly influenced by the matters set forth in the petition; and, he being of the opinion that he would not be influenced by the matters stated, we cannot disturb the order overruling plaintiff's application for a change of venue. A large discretion is lodged in the judge to whom such applications are made; and, while it cannot be said upon this record that there was error in overruling the petition for a change of venue in the case, the circumstances are such as might lead the plaintiff, and perhaps others, to question the propriety of Judge RUCKER's retaining the cause for trial before himself. As the judgment must be reversed for other reasons, we take the liberty of suggesting the advisability of calling in a judge of some other district to preside at the next trial, should one be had, unless a change of venue shall be granted in the mean time. We feel that all parties would be relieved from much embarrassment should this course be followed.

The next assignment of error is based upon the refusal of the court to permit the amended complaint to be filed. The original complaint is based upon the written contract of April 23, 1888. The amended complaint covers 27 pages of the printed abstract of record, and is composed largely of evidentiary matters that have no proper place in any pleading. Discarding the probative facts as surplusage, and we find that by this pleading the written contract of April 23, 1888, is sought to be set aside, and an interest in the Crowe lease established, on the theory of a contract of partnership between Crowe and Patrick antedating the lease, and by the terms of which the lease was to be procured in the name of Crowe for the benefit of the firm. The permitting of proper amendments is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, the exercise of which will only be controlled in case of abuse. If the change proposed by the amended pleading in this case could have been properly allowed at any stage in the proceeding, (a point we are not called upon to decide,) the refusal at the time offered was certainly not an abuse of discretion. The cause had already been set for trial upon the following day, it having been at issue for several months. The complaint on file affirmed the written contract, and asked for its enforcement. The amended complaint expressly disaffirms the written contract, and sets up a prior verbal agreement contrary thereto. The pleadings are not only inconsistent one with the other, but they are diametrically opposed to each other in all essential particulars. In the original complaint the interest of Patrick with Crowe in the lease is stated subject to the forfeiture, and the plaintiff asks for relief from the forfeiture claimed by Crowe and Ellis. In the amended complaint the written instrument is sought to be set aside or reformed, so as to relieve plaintiff entirely from the forfeiture clause. By it the pleading attempts to set up a cause of action that would, if properly pleaded, have required a new answer, and other and different evidence from that necessary, or even proper, under the issues as framed. Notwithstanding the great liberality enjoined by the Code in reference thereto, in practice the indulgence as to amendments must necessarily have some limit. In our opinion, the rejection of the amended complaint, under the circumstances, was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court, and the assignment of error based thereon cannot, therefore, be sustained.

It is claimed that many errors were committed by the court to the prejudice of the plaintiff in admitting incompetent testimony, against his objection, as well as in excluding competent testimony offered by him, upon the defendants' objection. The first item that merits consideration relates to testimony admitted in reference to a compromise attempted between plaintiff and defendants after the dispute had arisen out of which the suit arose. A compromise was talked over between the parties, but not finally consummated. In reference to this attempted compromise the plaintiff, while upon the witness stand, was asked by defendant this question, "What was your proposition?" to which question his counsel duly objected. This objection was overruled, and the plaintiff was compelled to give in detail his proposition to Mr. Crowe, made for the purpose of bringing about a settlement of the matters here in suit. This was clearly error. The law favors compromises. If parties can be compelled against their will, as in this case, to detail offers made for the purpose of settling matters in dispute to avoid litigation, certainly no prudent person would feel safe in offering any concessions for the purpose of bringing about a compromise. The ruling of the court below, if upheld, would have the tendency of preventing all negotiations looking to that end. If either party had in the course of these negotiations admitted any independent fact, such admission, under some circumstances, might have been proper evidence against the party making the same to establish such fact, if material; but the testimony was not offered for such purpose in this instance, and should not have been admitted. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1090; Houghton v. Houghton, 15 Beav. 321; Perkins v. Concord Railroad, 44 N. H. 223; Gay v. Bates, 99 Mass. 263; Durgin v. Somers, 117 Mass. 55; Draper v. Hatfield, 124 Mass. 53. Pending the negotiations for a compromise, and as a part thereof, the defendant Crowe caused to be drawn up a writing providing for the adjustment of the matters in dispute. This instrument was admitted in evidence against plaintiff's objection, although it was never signed by either of the parties. In fact the plaintiff absolutely refused to sign or agree to it. Inserted in this writing, which is quite long, are matters very prejudicial to plaintiff's case. In support of the rule admitting this paper, it is claimed that, as it is shown to have been either read by or to plaintiff, he must therefore be held to have acquiesced in those matters contained therein to which he did not specifically object. As we have seen, this instrument was a part of the negotiations for a compromise. It is not shown that it was presented to the plaintiff under circumstances calling for a denial from him other than that to be implied from his withholding his signature. It was at most but an offer of compromise made by the defendant Crowe and rejected by the plaintiff. Had it emanated from the plaintiff, its admissibility as evidence might well be doubted. Originating, as it did, with the defendant, it should not, under the circumstances, have been admitted as evidence against the plaintiff. Home Ins. Co. v. Baltimore Warehouse Co., 93 U. S. 527.

The court also erred in sustaining defendants' objection to the request of plaintiff to be allowed to cross-examine the defendant Crowe as to the conversation in which defendant states that the plaintiff made the representation that his sister-in-law was his partner for the purpose of strengthening his financial ability. The witness had previously testified that the plaintiff had represented that his sister-in-law was in partnership with him for the purpose of strengthening his financial ability; and, as it was shown that Mrs. Patrick, the person referred to as the sister-in-law, was not in partnership with the witness, the evident effect of the testimony was to cast discredit upon the plaintiff, who was a witness in his own behalf, and the plaintiff should have been permitted to have examined the witness fully in reference thereto.

The next objection to be considered is in reference to the question based upon the sworn answer of Crowe. In this answer the defendant Crowe denied under oath that he advised the plaintiff that the volume of water in said shaft was surface water. The question was objected to for the reason that it did not embody the entire paragraph of the complaint in which the language used occurs. After some discussion of counsel the court sustained this objection. This was error. As to whether or not the defendant Crowe advised plaintiff that the water in the shaft was surface water, and for this reason work should be discontinued until it disappeared, was a material question in the case. No good reason is perceived why the witness should not have been allowed to answer the question. The statement is complete in itself, without reference to other matters that appear in the same paragraph.

Upon the whole case the evidence is quite evenly balanced, as is shown by the fact that the jury decided for the plaintiff, while the findings of the court upon the same evidence are favorable to the defendants. An examination of the record convinces us that the plaintiff did not have a full opportunity to present his case in the court below. The force of his testimony was greatly broken, on the one hand, by objections that were improperly sustained; while, on the other, the force of his cross-examination of Crowe was weakened, if not entirely destroyed in some instances, by objections without merit, that were also sustained. Under the circumstances, we are of opinion that the judgment ought not to be allowed to stand. It is therefore reversed, and a new trial ordered.

STEWART V. KINDEL.

EVIDENCE—PAYMENT—MUTUAL MISTAKE.

1. In an action to recover money alleged to have been paid by mistake, the existence of a written contract between the parties does not render incompetent oral evidence of prior negotiations showing that the payment was no part of the transaction evidenced by the writing, and that it was wholly without consideration, and resulted from a mutual mistake.

2. An instruction that plaintiff is entitled to recover if, by reason of excitement or forgetfulness, he made a payment when nothing was owing to defendant, is not misleading when taken in connection with other portions of the charge, to the effect that, to warrant a recovery, the mistake must have been mutual.

3. Where the parties to the action and one of the attorneys of record are sworn as witnesses, in weighing the testimony the jury are at liberty to take into consideration the interest of each in the result of the action, so far as such interest is disclosed by the evidence.

4. The admission by defendant, while testifying as a witness in the case, of the existence of prejudice against plaintiff, does not preclude an inquiry into the extent of such ill feeling, nor a cross-examination as to the character of such prejudice.

Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

In this action appellee, Kindel, as plaintiff below, instituted this suit to recover money alleged to have been paid by him and received by appellant without consideration, by the mutual mistake of the parties. The defendant, in his answer, admits the payment of the money, but denies that the same was paid or received by mistake, or without consideration, and avers that the amount was paid in satisfaction of a just claim against the plaintiff. A trial to a jury resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff.

W. W. Cover, for appellant. John L. Jerome, for appellee.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first four assignments of error, so far as they are urged in this court, relate to the admission of certain evidence upon the trial against the appellant's objections. The testimony thus admitted relates to certain conversations which took place between the parties upon March 24, 1887. A written contract having been subsequently entered into by the parties, it is contended that oral evidence of the prior negotiations was not proper for the consideration of the jury. We do not think this objection well taken. The money sought to be recovered was paid to the defendant by a check upon a certain Denver bank. Had the giving of this check been a part of the agreement evidenced by the written contract, there would be some basis for defendant's objection; but whether or not it was intended as a part of that transaction was the vital point in issue between the parties upon which the jury were called upon to pass. The evidence tended to show that the payment was no part of the transaction evidenced by the writings; that it was wholly without consideration, and resulted from a mutual mistake. Under these circumstances, the testimony was competent.

The appellant, a witness in his own behalf in the court below, was required, against objection, upon cross-examination, to answer certain questions tending to show the existence of an unfriendly feeling between the parties, and this is assigned for error. It is one of the objects of cross-examination to show the relation existing between the witness and the party against whom, as well as the party for whom, he is called. And it can make no difference if the witness himself happens to be a party; anything tending to show either bias or prejudice, or to throw light upon the motives and inclinations of the witness, may be permitted, in order that the jury may be assisted in determining the weight that should be given the testimony of the witness. No doubt the extent of the inquiry rests somewhat in the discretion of the trial court. An investigation into particulars beyond what appears to be necessary to ascertain the nature and extent of the hostile feeling should not, of course, be permitted. In this case counsel were allowed to go to some extent into the details and particulars of such ill will, and, we think, rightfully so. The fact that the witness admitted the existence of ill feeling or prejudice against the plaintiff, did not preclude an inquiry into the extent or intensity of such ill feeling, nor a cross-examination as to the character and degree of such prejudice. State v. Collins, 33 Kan. 77, 5 Pac. Rep. 368; State v. Dee, 14 Minn. 35, (Gil. 27;) Batdorff v. Bank, 61 Pa. St. 179; McFarlin v. State, 41 Tex. 23; Thomp. Trials, §§ 450, 451. In State v. Dee, supra, it is said: "The object of this kind of testimony is to show bias and prejudice on the part of the witness, for the purpose of leading the jury to scrutinize, and perhaps to discredit, the testimony. If testimony of this character is to be received, it should be received in its most effective form, so that the purposes for which it is introduced may be best accomplished. A mere vague and general statement that hostile feeling existed would possess little force. It certainly must be proper to ask what the expression of hostility was, for the purpose of informing the jury of the extent and nature of the hostile feeling, so that they may determine how much allowance is to be made for it."

Several errors are assigned upon the instructions given by the court. By the first instruction the jury were told, in substance, that if they believed from the evidence that the payment was made when nothing was owing under the contract between the parties, and that it was made because Kindel did not, by reason of excitement or forgetfulness, appreciate the terms of the contract, then he was entitled to recover. This instruction is criticised by appellant because it leaves out, as it is said, the necessity of showing that the mistake was mutual. If considered by itself, it is possible the jury may have drawn such conclusion, although, if the amount was paid by the mistake of appellee and received by appellant when nothing was owing, it would seem to follow as a logical sequence that it must have also been received as well as paid by mistake; otherwise, appellant was guilty of fraud in receiving that to which he had no claim. We are not compelled to rely upon this, however, as in the instruction immediately following, as well as in other portions of the charge, the jury are told that to warrant a recovery the money must have been received, as well as paid, by mistake; i. e., to warrant a recovery, the mistake must have been mutual. Under the circumstances, we do not think it possible for the jury to have been misled as to the law upon this point. In construing a charge to a jury each instruction should be considered in connection with the entire charge, and if, considering the instructions as a whole, it appears that the jury were correctly advised by the court upon all material points in the case, this is sufficient. McClelland v. Burns, 5 Colo. 390; Thatcher v. Rockwell, 4 Colo. 375; Dozenback v. Raymer, 13 Colo. 451, 22 Pac. Rep. 787.

Upon the trial the parties to the action were each sworn, and testified, as did, also, one of the attorneys of record in the case. In reference to such testimony, the jury were told that in weighing the testimony of such witnesses they were at liberty to take into consideration the interests of each in the result of the action, so far as such interest was disclosed by the evidence. There was no error in this. The degree of credit to be given to each and all witnesses is a question exclusively for the jury; and if an attorney of record in a cause goes upon the stand as a witness, his testimony is to be weighed by the jury in view of all the surrounding circumstances appearing on the trial, including his professional connection with the case.

There is some conflict in the testimony in this case, but it was the peculiar province of the jury to decide upon which side lay the preponderance of the evidence. The verdict was against appellant. The cause appears to have been fairly submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and the verdict cannot be disturbed. The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

GARBANATI v. FASSBINDER.

SALE OF LAND—FRAUD OF VENDOR—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. No mere oral representation, made at the time of executing a contract for the sale of land, as to the quantity of land to be conveyed, unless of such a character as to amount to a fraud, is competent evidence to charge the vendor with liability, even if the land actually conveyed does not contain the full quantity orally represented.

2. The statute of frauds furnishes a rule of evidence, but not of pleading.

Error to district court, La Plata county.

In May, 1881, the parties to this action entered into a written contract, whereby Fassbinder agreed to sell and convey to Garbanati "lots Nos. 20 and 21, in block No. 6, in the town of North Durango, in La Plata county, state of Colorado, as surveyed, staked, and platted by C. M. Perin, civil engineer," etc. The lots thus described fronted on a street called "Grand Avenue." At the time of executing the written contract there was no street or alley in the rear of the lots. They abutted in the rear upon other lands belonging to Fassbinder. After the execution of the contract certain negotiations were had between the parties for the opening of an alley or narrow street in the rear of the lots. There is some conflict of evidence as to the result of these negotiations. But as a matter of fact Fassbinder did thereafter open a new street, called "Mesa Street," to the rear of these lots, giving a portion from his own land, and taking a portion from the rear of the lots sold to Garbanati, making the new street 40 feet in width. He also opened a cross street through block 6, connecting Mesa street with Grand avenue. Thus block 6 was divided, and the part in which Garbanati's lots were situated was called "Block 26," and his lots were numbered 4 and 5, respectively. A map was also filed in the office of the recorder of La Plata county, showing the new streets and new numberings; and in November, 1885, Fassbinder executed and delivered to Garbanati a warranty deed for "lots numbered four (4) and five, (5,) in block numbered 26, in the town of North Durango, as per map duly filed in the recorder's office," etc. It is conceded that the lots described in the deed, though differently numbered, are identically the same as those described in the contract except as they have been shortened by the opening of the new street. The plaintiff, Garbanati, by his complaint, claims to recover damages upon the ground that the defendant, Fassbinder, at the time of selling the lots represented them to be each of the size of 50 feet front by 200 feet deep, and that defendant did not convey to him the whole of the lots contracted for; that is, he complaints that he did not acquire by the deed the full quantity of land called for by the contract and by the representations made at the time of executing the contract. He makes no complaint of the change of the numbering of the lots, or of the opening of the streets, except as the size of his lots has been thereby diminished. To this complaint the defendant, Fassbinder, made defense, inter alia, to the effect that, subsequent to the execution of the written contract to convey, plaintiff agreed with defendant to the opening of the street in the rear of his lots, and to the taking of 20 feet off the rear end thereof for the purpose of said street, in consideration that defendant would give a like quantity of his land for said street; that the lots were accordingly so replatted, and the street so opened, at great expense by defendant; that the survey and plat by which the contract was entered into showed the lots to be each 50 feet front by 180 feet deep, and that the map by which they were deeded showed them to be each 50 feet front by 160 feet deep; and so the deed was executed and delivered in pursuance of the subsequent agreement. The plaintiff's reply, inter alia, denies that he agreed to give a portion of his lots for the street. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff brings the case to this court by writ of error.

ELLIOTT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) From the record before us it does not appear that any objection was made in the district court to the sufficiency of the pleadings by demurrer or otherwise; nor is any such objection interposed in this court. The assignments of error relate to the evidence and instructions of the court. The bill of exceptions is evidently imperfect. It does not purport to contain all the evidence, either oral or documentary. No errors in relation to the admission or exclusion of testimony appear in the record. Neither the written contract to convey nor the deed of warranty states the length or breadth of the lots, nor the quantity of land they contain. The contract describes the lots with reference to a particular survey, stakes, and platting; the deed describes them with reference to a particular map. No mere oral representation which may have been made at the time of executing either of the writings, as to the size of the lots, unless of such a character as to amount to a fraud, was competent evidence to charge defendant with liability in the action, even if the lots actually conveyed did not contain the full amount of land orally represented; and, in the absence of fraud, the purchaser, as well as the seller, was bound by the description referred to in the written contract, except as the same may have been changed by the subsequent agreement as alleged. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 275; 3 Washb. Real Prop. p. 401 et seq.; Cabot v. Christie, 42 Vt. 121; Canal Co. v. Emmett, 9 Paige, 168. By certain requests to instruct the jury the plaintiff sought to present the question whether defendant could prove the agreement averred in his answer in reference to taking a portion of plaintiff's lots for the street by evidence not in writing. The answer does not and need not disclose whether the alleged agreement was in writing or by parol. It is unnecessary, therefore, to determine whether or not the statute of frauds is applicable to the alleged agreement in this case; for the statute furnishes a rule of evidence, not of pleading, and the record does not purport to contain all the evidence. Tucker v. Edwards, 7 Colo. 209, 3 Pac. Rep. 233. Plaintiff's remaining requests to charge were either unnecessary, by reason of the matters contained in the charge as given, or were improper under the issues as framed. It is impossible to determine to what portion of the charge, as given, the assignments of error relate. From the whole charge, however, the case seems to have been fairly submitted to the jury upon the issues as framed by the parties. Among other matters, the trial court correctly charged the jury to the effect that the written contract must control as to the land agreed to be conveyed; and that, in case of a variance between the plat and the stakes, the latter must control, inasmuch as plaintiff had admitted that he examined the stakes before purchasing. The court further charged the jury, in substance, that if they should find from the evidence that a portion of the premises included in the contract to convey was not included in the deed as executed, then plaintiff was entitled to damages for the loss of the premises not thus included in the deed, unless they should also find from the evidence that he subsequently agreed with defendant or his agent to surrender a portion of said premises for the street which was afterwards laid out; but that, if plaintiff did subsequently agree to surrender such portion for the street, then he could not recover. As far as we can judge from the evidence in the record, there appears to be no reason for disturbing the verdict. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

LIVE-STOCK—TEXAS FEVER—ACTION FOR COMMUNICATING DISEASE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. In New Mexico, when trial by jury is waived, the verdict of the court may be reviewed on appeal the same as a verdict of the jury.

2. It is within the discretion of the court to say whether a witness is competent to testify as an expert.

3. In an action for damages for transporting cattle infected with "Texas fever," and communicating the disease to plaintiffs' cattle, one of the defendants testified that before he brought his cattle from Texas he had heard of the disease, and that it came from the south, but that he did not believe in it. Another defendant testified that he had heard of the disease, and that plaintiff had protested against their transporting the cattle for fear of it. Act Cong. May 29, 1884, recognizes the existence of "Texas fever." Held, that defendants were fully informed and warned as to the danger of communicating the disease.

4. To render one liable under Act Cong. May 30, 1884, prohibiting the transporting from one state or territory to another of live-stock infected with a contagious disease, actual knowledge of infection is not necessary; it is sufficient if the locality from which they are shipped is known to be infected.

5. Under this act it is immaterial where the disease was communicated.

6. On a trial by the court admission of incompetent evidence is not ground for reversal if it does not appear that the court relied on it.

Appeal from district court, Dona Ana county.

This is an action of trespass on the case, brought by plaintiffs and appellees against the defendants and appellants in the district court in and for the county of Dona Ana, to recover damages occasioned to plaintiffs' herd of cattle by the communication to them, as alleged, of a certain contagious disease alleged to be commonly called "Texas cattle fever," by defendants' cattle, whereby it is claimed that a large number of cattle died, and a large number of the remainder thereof became sick and were deteriorated in value, and the plaintiffs were compelled to lay out and expend large sums of money for medicines and for nursing and caring for their said cattle, for all of which they claim damage in the sum of $20,000. There are two counts in the declaration,—one alleging that the disease was communicated to plaintiffs' cattle in the county of Dona Ana; the other, that the disease was communicated to plaintiffs' cattle in the county of Sierra. In every other respect the two counts are exactly alike. The declaration, in substance, alleges that at the time of the grievances complained of the plaintiffs were in the lawful, quiet, and peaceable possession of certain lands and premises in the county of Sierra, to-wit, a cattle ranch, range, and pasture lands, with certain watering places thereon, suitable for pasturing, grazing, watering, and raising neat cattle and stock, and which were then and there free from any contagion or infection, dangerous, noxious, or fatal to neat cattle or stock; and that they then had, kept, pastured, and grazed on said lands and premises a large number of neat cattle, which were entirely healthy, and free from any contagion or infection, dangerous, noxious, or fatal to neat cattle; and that said cattle were especially free from a certain contagious, noxious, dangerous, infectious, and fatal disease, commonly known as the "Texas cattle fever," all of which the said defendants then and there knew. That the said defendants, while the plaintiffs were in peaceable possession of, and keeping, pasturing, and grazing their cattle upon said lands and premises, wrongfully, negligently, carelessly, and willfully, contriving to injure plaintiffs, against the wishes, protests, and remonstrances of the plaintiffs, turned in upon, drove, watered, herded, pastured, and kept on, said lands and premises, and among and with the said neat cattle of plaintiffs thereon pastured, kept, and grazed, a large number of other neat cattle, to-wit, 1,000 neat cattle, sick, diseased, and then and there infected with a noxious, dangerous, contagious, and fatal disease commonly known as the

"Texas cattle fever." That said defendants well knew that said neat cattle so turned in upon, driven, watered, herded, pastured, and kept upon said lands and premises had shortly before then been imported and introduced by defendants into said county from a certain place or district in the state of Texas infected with said contagious disease known as the "Texas cattle fever." That said defendants then and there well knew that said cattle were then and there infected with said Texas cattle fever, and had shortly before then been exposed to the infection of Texas cattle fever. That said defendants well knew that said cattle were liable to communicate the said contagious disease to the cattle of the plaintiffs; by reason whereof, and through the carelessness and negligence and willfulness of defendants in the premises, said contagious disease was by the cattle of said defendants communicated to the cattle of said plaintiffs, so that 500 head of plaintiffs' cattle, of the value of $15,000, became infected, sick, and disordered with said contagious disease; and that 400 thereof, of the value of $12,000, died thereby; and the rest thereof, to-wit, 100 head, of the value of $3,000, were rendered worthless to plaintiffs in consequence of said disease so communicated to them; and that plaintiffs wholly lost the use and benefit and profit thereof, and were compelled to pay out large sums of money, to-wit, $5,000, for medicine, nursing, and care of said cattle so sick and diseased. Wherefore they pray judgment, etc. To which said declaration said defendants pleaded (1) not guilty; (2) a plea traversing all the allegations in the said declaration, upon both of which said pleas issue was joined by said plaintiffs. Said case was tried by the court, a jury being waived by an agreement in writing, at the March term, A. D. 1886, of the district court for the county of Dona Ana. The court found for the plaintiffs generally on the second count of the declaration, refusing to make any special findings, or any findings whatever other than the general finding for plaintiffs on said count, and assessed their damages at $5,200.

Catron, Knaebel & Clancy and Elliott & Pickett, for appellants. S. B. Newcomb and E. C. Wade, for appellees.

LEE, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The defendants, in their supplementary brief, submit for our consideration the question: Has this court authority to review on bill of exceptions questions as to the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or the ruling of the court below on matters of law, where the case was submitted to the court for trial without the intervention of a jury? And in their brief cite the case of Martinton v. Fairbanks, 112 U. S. 675, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, in which the court say that prior to the passage of the act of congress of March 3, 1865, "when the case is submitted to the judge to find the facts without the intervention of a jury, he acts as a referee, by consent of the parties, and no bill of exceptions will lie to his reception or rejection of evidence, nor to his judgment on the law;" citing Weems v. George, 13 How. 190, as fully sustaining the proposition. The statute of the territory of New Mex-leo, in force at the time of the trial, was as follows: "Trial by jury may be waived by the several parties to any issue of fact in the following cases: (1) By suffering default, or by failing to appear at the trial; (2) by written consent, in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk. Comp. Laws N. M. § 2060. By section 4 of the act of congress of March 3, 1865, it is provided that parties may submit the issues of fact in civil cases to be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury. The act continues: "The finding of the court upon the facts, which finding shall be general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of the jury. The rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, when excepted to at the time, may be reviewed by the supreme court of the United States upon a writ of error or upon appeal, provided the rulings be duly presented by a bill of exceptions. When the finding is special, the review may also extend to the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment." Though the act of congress is much more specific and clear as to intent than that of the legislature of this territory, yet, in order to give force and effect to the act of the legislature, we think the court may clearly imply the intent of the legislature to the full extent of the provisions of the act of congress; and in fact we might have come to the same conclusion if that act of congress had not been passed, as was held in Insurance Co. v. Folsom, 18 Wall. 249: "That none of these rules are new, as they were established by numerous decisions of this court long before the act of congress in question was enacted." In this view of the question, we have but to consider the act of the legislature, in the light of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in construing the act of congress referred to, and to apply their rulings under it to this case. At the time this case was tried below, the statutes of New Mexico did not require the judge in cases tried before him to make special findings. He could make either special or general findings, and in this respect it would be in accord with the provisions of the act of congress. Under that act the supreme court held in Insurance Co. v. Folsom, supra: "Where a jury is waived, and the issues of fact submitted to the court, the findings could be either special or general, as in cases where issues of fact are tried by a jury; but where the finding is general the parties are concluded by the determination of the court, except where exceptions are taken to the rulings of the court in the progress of the trial. Such rulings, if duly presented by a bill of exceptions, may be reviewed here, even if the findings are general; but the findings of the court of the facts cannot be reviewed in this court on a bill of exceptions, or in any other manner, for the seventh amendment to the constitution of the United States declares that 'no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.'" The only methods known to the common law for the re-examination of the facts found by a jury are either by a new trial granted by the court in which the issues had been tried or by the award of a venire facias de novo by the appellate court for some error of law. And, having decided to give effect to the act of the legislature before referred to, we must hold the finding of the court, where the jury is waived, to be, in effect, the same as the verdict of a jury. Nothing, therefore, is open to re-examination in this case except such of the rulings of the court, made during the progress of the trial, as are duly presented by the bill of exceptions. The weight of evidence and the inferences of fact must be drawn by the court below, as it was the judge of that court, and not the supreme court, that was substituted, by the agreement of the parties, in the stead of the jury; and where a jury is waived, and the case tried by the court, the bill of exceptions brings up nothing for revision but what it would have brought had there been a jury trial. Tested by the considerations already given, and from the fact of the absence of any then existing statute or rule of law requiring the court to make special findings, it is clear that the exceptions of the defendants to the rulings of the court refusing to make special findings, as requested by their counsel, must be overruled. This ruling is directly sustained in Clark v. Fredericks, 105 U. S. 4, where, as here, it was assigned as one of the errors, and the court said: "The findings are conclusive as to the facts, and they cover all the issues. Whether the distinct facts set forth in the requests for findings presented by the plaintiffs in error were proven or not we need not inquire. As the court declined to find them, we must presume they were not established by the evidence." To the same effect, see, also, Tloga R. Co. v. Blossburg & C. R. Co., 20 Wall. 143.

This brings us to the consideration of the bill of exceptions as to exceptions taken to the rulings of the court, during the progress of the trial, and the errors assigned thereon. In the motion for a new trial the defendants below set up that the judgment is contrary to, and not sustained by, the evidence in the following particular statement of facts: (1) It is not proven that the plaintiffs' cattle died from a contagious or infectious disease, called "Texas cattle fever," or from any infectious or contagious disease whatever. (2) It is not proven that Texas cattle fever exists, and, if it does exist, that it is a contagious and infectious disease. (3) That if the defendants' cattle, at the time of introducing them into New Mexico, and driving them over the road across the land where plaintiffs' cattle ranged, were possessed of or infected with the Texas cattle fever, or any germ thereof. (The evidence clearly shows that the defendants, prior to and at the time of bringing their Texas cattle through the plaintiffs' and onto their own range, had no knowledge whatever that said cattle were infected with any contagious or infectious disease known as "Texas cattle fever," or with any disease.) (4) It is not proven that the defendants had any knowledge whatever that the district or section of country from which they drove their cattle in Texas was infected with the Texas cattle fever, or any germ or principle thereof. (5) It is not proven that the distract or section of country in Texas where the defendants' cattle were brought from, or any other district or section of country in Texas that may be claimed to be infected with Texas cattle fever, was so infected, and that said cattle were brought from such section or district of country in Texas within a period in which they might directly or indirectly communicate such disease to other cattle. (6) It is proven that the defendants drove their cattle along the public highway, across the land where the plaintiffs were pasturing, and in so doing handled and managed said cattle in as careful, cautious, and prudent a manner as a prudent man would have done in reference to his own property. (7) It is proven that the defendants, in driving said cattle along said highway, across the land where plaintiffs' cattle ranged, prevented plaintiffs' cattle from mixing or mingling with them, so far as it was possible to do. (8) It is proven that the defendants kept their cattle on their own range, so far as it was possible so to do, using reasonable and ordinary care and caution in so doing. (9) It is proven that the defendants used as much or more care and caution in handling their cattle on their range and keeping them there as it was the custom of the country to use in such cases. (10) It is proven that if the defendants had any knowledge that their cattle were infected with any contagious disease the plaintiffs had equal knowledge of that fact. (11) It is proven that the plaintiffs permitted large bodies of their cattle to range on the range of the defendants after the defendants' cattle were brought there in July, 1884, which cattle went back and forth from plaintiffs' range to defendants' range, and carried with them onto the plaintiffs' range portions of defendants' cattle. (12) It is proven that if defendants' cattle communicated any disease to plaintiffs' cattle it was done either from the road which passed over plaintiffs' range or on defendants' range to plaintiffs' cattle, which grazed upon defendants' range, or by defendants' cattle that drifted down into plaintiffs' range; but it is not possible to determine in which manner it was done, if done at all. (13) It is proven that the road over which the defendants drove their cattle through the plaintiff's range passes over public land, and the defendants, in driving said cattle, did not pass over any land owned, possessed, or claimed by the plaintiffs. (14) It is proven that the defendants, in driving their said cattle, kept them on the public highway, and did not permit them to scatter any more than was absolutely necessary to do in driving such cattle. (15) That there is no proof that the plaintiffs owned or possessed or had the right to the possession of any land further than the immediate spots on which their houses and corrals are situated. (16) That there is no legal proof of any title, or claim of title, legal or equitable, or possession, actual or constructive, on the part of the said plaintiffs, of, in, and to any land where the defendants' cattle passed or grazed. (17) That the proofs are indefinite and uncertain as to where the plaintiffs' cattle contracted their disease. (18) That the proofs are indefinite and uncertain as to the disease from which the plaintiffs' cattle died. (19) It is proven that the plaintiffs did not exercise due care and prudence in managing their own cattle, and in permitting said cattle to range on defendants' land.

It appears to have been the theory of the plaintiffs in error that the general findings in the case include both questions of law and of fact, and that by excepting to the general findings they excepted to such conclusions of law as the general findings imply; but we have given to the findings of the court the full effect of a general verdict of a jury. The general verdict of a jury concludes mixed questions of law and fact, except so far as they may have been saved by some exception which may have been taken to the ruling of the court upon some question of law. Norris v. Jackson, 9 Wall. 125; Martinton v. Fairbanks, 112 U. S. 670, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321. It is not the intention or policy of the law in the United States that an appellate court should reverse a case for an error of fact; and the congress of the United States, by a direct provision in the twenty-second section of the judiciary act, (1 St. at Large, 85,) positively prohibits the supreme court of the United States from reversing any case "for error in fact." And, say the supreme court of the United States in Martinton v. Fairbanks, supra: "Upon the issues of fact raised by the pleadings in this case there was a general finding for the plaintiff. The defendant contends that the evidence submitted to the court did not justify this general finding; but, if the finding depends upon the weighing of conflicting evidence, it was a decision on the facts, the revision of which is forbidden to this court by section 1011, Rev. St. If the question was whether all the evidence was sufficient in law to warrant a finding for the plaintiff he should have presented that question by a request for a definite ruling upon that point." We think, taking all the grounds set forth in the motion for a new trial, that the attention of the court was called to the sufficiency of the evidence in such a manner as to be a direct request for a definite ruling thereon; and this necessitates an examination of the evidence in order to determine whether it is sufficient to support the findings for the plaintiff, which testimony must be considered in connection with an act of congress which, at the time of the alleged shipment of the cattle from the state of Texas to the territory of New Mexico, was enforced, an extract of which is as follows: "Sec. 6. * * * Nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot and transport in private conveyance from one state or territory to another, or from any state into the District of Columbia, or from the district into any state, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially the disease known as 'pleuro-pneumonia:' provided that the so-called 'splenetic' or 'Texas fever' shall not be considered a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease within the meaning of sections four, five, six, and seven of this act, as to cattle being transported by rail to market for slaughter, when the same are unloaded only to be fed and watered in lots on the way thereto." 23, U. S. St. at Large, 32, approved May 23, 1884. The penalty for the violation of the above provision is a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both fine and imprisonment. There is no pretension that the said cattle were being transported for slaughter, or that they were unloaded only to be fed. If the cattle were affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and the defendants were aware of that fact at or during the time of the shipment, then such transportation was in violation of the statute. Congress, by the above act, fully recognizes the existence of a disease called "splenetic" or "Texas" fever, a disease of a contagious, infectious, or communicable character, to which cattle are subject; and in legal effect the act conveys direct information to the defendants of the existence of the so-called disease. And whether the cattle shipped by the said defendant from San Antonio, Tex., to Hatch Station, in New Mexico, and driven across the plaintiffs' range to that of the defendants, in said territory, during the month of July, 1884, were infected with a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and, if so infected, whether the defendants knew, or had any reason to know of such infection, must be determined from all the evidence and circumstances in the case.

As is usually the case, the testimony is conflicting where experts are examined as to matters of professional opinion; and, while such testimony is admissible, it is not always satisfactory. It is frequently based upon a theory which is incorrect in its premises, and which, therefore, must fall when it comes in contact with more enlightened investigation. For that reason that which may have been regarded as an established fact one day may be overthrown and regarded as preposterous at another. For instance, some creditable historian computes the number of persons executed as witches during the Christian epoch at nine millions; and throughout the middle ages it is doubted if one person could be found who doubted the reality of witchcraft. Though the delusion continued in strong force down to the beginning of the present century, yet to-day a belief in it would be admitted on the question of a person's sanity. Dr. Don-alson, an expert witness in the celebrated trial of Mrs. Elizabeth Wharton for the murder, by poisoning, of Gen. W. S. Ketchum, tried at Annapolis, Md., in 1872, said: "The medical science is progressive, and we have no security that all the theories now in vogue will not be upset in thirty years." Pamphlet of Trial, p. 58. Yet the uncertainty that may attach to the theories of experts cannot impair or do away with the necessity of that class of testimony on questions of science, skill, trade, and the like. Persons conversant with the subject-matter, termed "experts," are permitted to give their opinion in evidence whenever the subject-matter of inquiry is such that inexperienced persons are unlikely to prove capable of forming a correct judgment upon it without such assistance. Persons that have devoted their lives to the scientific investigation of the subject are better prepared to give an opinion than those persons who have given the subject no investigation; and thus experts are allowed to give an opinion, not on the case in question, unless they have heard all the evidence, but on the state of facts hypothetically stated, and such opinions must of necessity be received as evidence, and it is about the only way facts of a scientific character can be proved. It would not be easy to overrate the value of evidence given in many difficult and delicate inquiries, not only by medical men and physiologists, but by learned and experienced persons in various branches of science, art, and trade. But it is impossible to measure the integrity of every witness, or to determine the exact amount of skill which a person following a particular science, art, or trade may possess. The court is under the necessity of listening to the testimony of all such persons, and it is sometimes very difficult for the court to determine whether their opinions should be admitted as evidence. Perhaps the rule as established in France would be the better. There experts are officially delegated by the court to inquire into facts and report upon them, and they stand on much higher footing than do either ordinary or scientific witnesses with us.

Objections were made in this case to portions of the testimony of certain witnesses for the reason that proper predicate had not been shown as to their skill as experts. What standard of skill they claim should be shown is not set forth, and the standards to be gathered from the adjudicated cases are almost as varied as the cases themselves; and no definite rule, that we can find, is, or, as we think, can be, laid down. Thus it is said in Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 63 Pa. St. 151: "An 'expert' as the word imports, is one having had experience. No clearly-defined rule is to be found in the books as to what constitutes an expert. Much depends upon the nature of the question asked. While undoubtedly it must appear that the witness has enjoyed some means of special knowledge or experience, yet no rule can be laid down, in the nature of things, as to the extent of it." The same court, in Sorg v. First German, etc., Congregation, Id. 161, held: "The preliminary question of fact as to whether a witness is an expert qualified to pronounce an opinion must, in a great measure, be confided to the discretion of the court below trying the case, and we will not reverse either on account of the admission or rejection of such evidence, unless in a clear and strong case." In State v. Wood, 53 N. H. 484, it was held that a physician may testify as an expert to his opinion formed by reading and study alone. Also the same court, in an action for communicating foot-rot to sheep, permitted the editor of a stock journal, who had read extensively on the subject, to testify as an expert. Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452: "An expert may testify to general facts which are the result of general knowledge or scientific skill." In Emerson v. Gas-Light Co., 6 Allen, 148, and in Morse v. Crawford, 17 Vt. 499, it was held that a witness, not a professional man, may give his opinion in evidence in connection with facts upon which it is founded, and as derived from them. The supreme court of the United States has extended the rule far beyond a point that we would be willing to have gone, had not a court of such eminent authority so ruled. In the case of Spring Co. v. Edgar, 99 U. S. 645,—a suit for damages for injuries inflicted on a party from an attack by a pet deer in a park,—a witness for the plaintiff, introduced as an expert, testified that he was a dentist, and resided in Albany; that he was to some extent acquainted with the habits and nature of the deer, and had hunted them; that in his opinion the buck deer are not generally considered as dangerous, but that in the fall they are more dangerous than at other seasons. Another expert testified that he was a taxidermist, and had made natural history a study, and had read the standard authors in regard to the general characteristics of deer; that from his reading he was of opinion that the male deer, after they had attained their growth and become matured, are dangerous; and that during the rutting season, from the middle of September to the middle of December, the buck deer are generally vicious. The defendant objected to all of the testimony of the experts, on the ground that the witnesses had not shown themselves competent as experts, and that it was improper, immaterial, and incompetent; but the court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted. The supreme court, sustaining the ruling, say: "Whether a witness is shown to be qualified or not as an expert is a preliminary question to be determined, in the first place, by the court; and the rule is that, if the court admits the testimony, then it is for the jury to decide whether any, and, if any, what, weight is to be given to the testimony. Cases arise where it is very much a matter of discretion with the court whether to receive or exclude the evidence; but the appellate court will not reverse in such a case, unless the ruling is manifestly erroneous;" and cites in support thereof Tow-Boat Co. v. Starrs, 69 Pa. St. 36; Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 48; Tucker v. Railroad Co., 118 Mass. 546.

The substantial portion of the experts' testimony objected to is, first, that of Prof. Salmon, professor of veterinary medicine, and for years chief of the United States bureau of animal industry, who testified: "Healthy cattle cannot disseminate a contagion of which they are not infected or possessed of; but they may be infected of a contagion, and disseminate and communicate it, though they themselves are insusceptible to its effects, and show no symptoms of the disease; in other words, they may carry contagion without being visibly affected by it. To illustrate this: A person who has been vaccinated may go into a small-pox hospital without contracting the disease, and, coming away, he might carry the contagion, and infect non-vaccinated persons." And also that of Prof. Detmar, a veterinary surgeon, for many years in the employment of the United States in capacity of veterinarian in connection with the agricultural department, whose testimony fully corroborates that of Prof. Salmon. They refer, in illustration of their testimony, to the reports of investigations made by them to the bureau of animal industry while under the employment of the government; and, briefly, their testimony tends to establish the following facts: (1) That a disease called "splenetic" or "Texas" fever does exist. (2) That it is caused from a diseased germ of a parasite of fungus nature, growing or attached to grasses in tide-water sections of the Southern states. (3) Where these germs grow, or are reproduced from year to year, are called the "infected districts." (4) While cattle raised in the permanently infected districts become inured to the disease, and are not thereby violently attacked by it themselves, they nevertheless carry the disease germs in their systems, and deposit them with their excrement, and thus infect the trails and pastures over which they pass; and that this is the only way they communicate or impart the disease. (5) That cattle from non-infected districts, sick with the fever, do not impart the disease to other stock, nor do they infect the lands over which they graze. (6) Cattle from the infected districts expel the disease germs in a certain length of time, varying from 70 to 90 days, after leaving the infected districts; and after that they are incapable of infecting the roads, pastures, or lands over which they pass. (7) Frost destroys the disease germ, and puts a stop to its infection. (8) That the greater part of Texas, including the southern part, (from which the defendant's cattle were shipped,) is in the infected district. (9) The diagnosis of the disease called "splenetic" or "Texas" fever by the experts would appear to be the same and identical with that detailed by the witnesses that attended to and doctored the plaintiffs' sick cattle. If the showing on the part of the witnesses in the deer case, above referred to, is all that is required, the question is not so much as to who will be allowed to testify and give their opinions as experts, but rather who will not be; at any rate, there can be no question of the correctness of the admission of the testimony of Profs. Salmon, Detmar, and other experts in the case.

It is contended by the defendants that, even if such a disease exists, and if the said cattle were infected with it, yet there is no evidence that the defendants had any knowledge of the infection, and therefore are not liable. One of the defendants, William Hopewell, testified: "I heard of Texas cattle fever. I heard before we brought these cattle from Texas. Heard of a large number of cattle dying on the Membras river. Heard that Texas cat-

the fever came from the southern country,"—but added: "I don't believe there is any such thing as Texas cattle fever." There does not appear to have been any lack of knowledge on his part, but he appears to have relied on his disbelief of the existence of such a disease. His opinion, in that respect, was immaterial. The statute had recognized the existence of a so-called disease as an infectious and communicable disease, and he was bound to take notice of it, and observe it. Nathan Grayson, another defendant, testified that he had heard of Texas cattle fever; and also that he had a talk with George Lynch, one of the plaintiffs, before the cattle were brought, and that Lynch protested against his unloading his cattle at Hatch Station, for the reason that their (Lynch's) cattle might contract some disease from them. Considering this testimony with that on the part of the plaintiffs in the same connection, this defendant must be regarded as having been fully informed and warned as to the danger of communicating said disease. It would not be required, on the part of the plaintiffs, to prove that the defendants knew as an absolute fact that their cattle, when being shipped, were carrying the disease germs with them; but, if they were shipping from a locality known to be infected and liable to communicate the disease, they would come under the provisions of the statute before referred to, and it would devolve upon them to take such precautionary steps as would prevent their cattle from communicating any infectious or communicable disease to other cattle; and in such case it would be immaterial where such disease was communicated, whether it was on the public commons, in the public roads, or on the lands of the plaintiffs. Taking this view of the case disposes of the principal grounds set forth in the defendants' motion for a new trial, and makes it possible for this court to find that the evidence in the case sustains the general findings of the court below.

The defendant took exceptions to some 50 different rulings of the court in the progress of the trial of the case on the admission in evidence by the court of certain statements or testimony of witnesses, and to the admission in evidence of certain written documents on the ground that they were improper, incompetent, and immaterial. The rule in cases where the trial is by the court is entirely different from that where the trial is by a jury. Cases are often reversed where improper or incompetent evidence has been admitted before a jury, for the reason that they may have been misled by it, but such a reason does not exist where the trial was by the court. And in a trial by a court "the admission of incompetent evidence at a trial below is no cause for reversal, if it could not possibly have prejudiced the other party." District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 136 U. S. 450, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 990. Thus it has been held: The fact that incompetent testimony has been admitted is not sufficient ground for reversing the judgment where the cause has been tried by the court without a jury. "In such case the appellate court will give no weight to such testimony in the determination of the appeal, but will not reverse the judgment because it was admitted." Frisk v. Reigelman, (Wis.) 43 N. W. Rep. 1119. Also in the supreme court of California, (White v. White): "When the court tries the case this court never reverses for the admission of irrelevant evidence, unless it appears that the court in making the decision relied on such irrelevant evidence." 23 Pac. Rep. 284. "A finding of fact in a case at law tried without a jury is conclusive where there is any evidence to found it on, even though the evidence is conflicting." Hathaway v. Bank, 134 U. S. 494, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608; Zanz v. Stover, 2 N. M. 29; Kundinger v. Railway Co., 51 Mich. 185, 16 N. W. Rep. 330. The principle as expressed in the preceding cases is fully recognized and authoritatively established as the law by the supreme court of the United States. In Field v. U. S., 9 Pet. 182, it was held that in a cause where the trial by jury had been waived the objection to the admission of evidence was not properly the subject of a bill of exceptions, and the reason given is that, if the evidence was improperly admitted, the court would reject it, and proceed to decide the cause as if it were not in the record. And it has been recognized in several subsequent cases. In Arthurs v. Hart, 17 How. 12, speaking of the rule, the court says: "It certainly is so as far as the evidence improperly admitted bears upon a question of fact in the cause; for, when rejected, if there is still any proper evidence tending to support the judgment of the court below, the decision cannot be reviewed on a writ of error. The error in this aspect would be unimportant, because not the subject of an exception, the question involved being one of fact. If, upon the rejection of the evidence, no testimony would remain necessary to support the judgment of the court, then the mistake would be one of law, and a proper subject of a writ of error." In this case it does not appear that the court relied on such evidence, and the presumptions are, if any was admitted, it was not considered by the court in making its findings. A different rule would apply where the exceptions were to the rejection of competent and proper testimony; but the exceptions in this case, in every instance, are to the reception of evidence over objection, and therefore come directly under the rule laid down in the case cited above. Therefore the further examination of these exceptions becomes immaterial. Finding no substantial error sufficient to reverse the case, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

PERRY v. CITY COUNCIL OF SALT LAKE CITY.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Feb. 19, 1891.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE—DISCRETION IN GRANTING.

Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 1755, subd. 40, providing that the council of Salt Lake City shall have power "to license, regulate, and tax" the sale of intoxicating liquors, vests in the council a legal discretion, and not an arbitrary power; and it cannot refuse a license to an applicant who has complied with the law governing applications for a license to sell intoxicating liquors. Per MINER, J., dissenting.

Application for mandamus. For majority opinion, see ante, 739.

The power of the council of Salt Lake City in respect to licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors was conferred by 1 Comp. Laws Utah 1888. Section 1755 provides that the city council shall have the power "to license, regulate, and tax" the selling of intoxicating liquors.

MINER, J. I am unable to fully concur with the majority of the court in this case. The relator appears to have complied with all the requirements of the statutes and ordinances, and it cannot be claimed that the place at which he proposes to carry on the business is within the prohibition of the statute or ordinances. The question arises, can the city council, under the power to regulate (conferred by the charter) impose additional restrictions? If so, how is that power to be exercised? Must it be by ordinance, so that the requirements prescribed, whatever they may be, will operate uniformly upon all alike under the same circumstances, thus precluding partiality and favoritism; or may the council, notwithstanding the compliance by the applicant with all the provisions of the statute and ordinances of the city upon the subject, arbitrarily grant or refuse each particular license as the same is applied for, and that, too, without giving any reason for its action? It seems to me that the regulation should properly be by an ordinance. If the statute conferred upon the council any such absolute power, then, as relator's counsel contend, are they admirably calculated to enable the members of the city council to reward their friends and punish their enemies, but they furnish no safeguards for equality or honesty of official action. Some members may vote against the application because in their honest judgment it would be detrimental to the best interests of the city to grant it; another, because he believes there are already saloons too many; another, because the applicant is a personal enemy of his; another, because the applicant is not a member of his religious or political faith; another, because he does not think it right to sell liquor, or license a wrong; another, because he wants to prohibit the sale. Thus a bare majority may be secured against the issuance of the license to one man and grant it to another. It is claimed that in this case seven councilmen voted for and seven against the petition, the mayor giving the casting vote against it. Neither the council, as a body, nor any individual member thereof voting against the application, gave or could be induced to give any reason for his vote or action; and why this license is refused this court is still in ignorance, except by the return, which gives no reason for individual or corporate action.

The sale of liquor has always been a lawful business in this city. It has never been prohibited by statute, and the council never had the power to prohibit it. By the charter of 1860 it had power to license, regulate, and restrain it. See Comp. Laws 1876, pp. 699-703, § 24. And so it remained until January 20, 1882, when the charter was amended. By the amendment, power was given to the city council to license, tax, and regulate; the power to restrain being omitted. This leaves no power to prohibit. See Laws 1882, p. 2. The defense rests entirely upon the supposed right of the council, in its discretion, to grant or withhold license as it may see fit. All men are equal before the law; and if one man, on complying with the statutory provisions, may be licensed to engage in the business of selling liquors, every other man in like condition, on complying in like manner with the conditions imposed by law, has an equal right to a similar license. Legislation in a free republican form of government should mete out equal rights to all law-abiding citizens; and it is alike against the spirit and form of our government and institutions to grant any special privileges to one individual, and deny it to another who stands on equal footing with himself; and this, in my judgment, cannot be accomplished under the guise of "discretion." The "discretion" vested by the legislature in the city council is not an arbitrary power, to be exercised as the caprice or prejudices of that body may dictate, but a legal discretion, whereby the council is to determine whether or not the applicant has substantially complied with the provisions of law. The common council of a city must be governed by the same rules of law in their action upon the granting of these licenses as other bodies who are called upon by statute to pass upon the qualifications of others to engage in any business or calling requiring special conditions preliminary to its exercise, and they are bound in all cases to act fairly, and to treat each application upon its own merits, impartially. In the present case it seems there is one saloon in the neighborhood already licensed, and the common council think this sufficient for the needs of the neighborhood. If this reasoning were sound, the common council might, in their "discretion," grant to any favored individual an exclusive monopoly of the business in any neighborhood, or even in the entire city. Could a more fruitful field of favoritism be possibly devised? It is certainly not in accordance with my views as to equality before the law. That the discretion vested in the common council is not an arbitrary power, but a legal discretion, to be exercised equally towards all in like condition, I might cite numberless authorities. I call attention, however, to Ex parte Candee, 48 Ala. 386; State v. County Court, 41 Mo. 221-227; Mixer v. Supervisors, 26 Mich. 422; Amperse v. Kalamazoo, 59 Mich. 78, 26 N. W. Rep. 222; Potter v. Homer, 59 Mich. 8, 26 N. W. Rep. 208; Zanone v. Mound City, 103 Ill. 532; Golden v. Bingham, 61 Ind. 198; 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 641. It is true that the charter of the city allows the council power to license, regulate, and tax this business, which is greater authority than merely to approve or reject the bonds; but the council have not decided that the place or neighborhood was improper wherein to carry on the traffic, nor that the relator was disqualified in any manner, but have merely said, in effect, that in that neighborhood one man may engage in the business, but another may not. This is not a question of prohibiting the traffic in that locality, but of prohibiting a particular individual, against whom no disqualification is alleged, and who has complied with the law, from engaging in the business, and at the same time permitting another, under no worse legal circumstances, to do so. This cannot, in my view, be deemed within the discretionary powers of the council. I think the council had no right to withhold the license, and that the mandamus should issue as prayed.

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Feb. 17, 1891.)

RAPE — COMPLAINT — EVIDENCE AT PRELIMINARY HEARING — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS — VERDICT.

1. Where the complaint charging a crime is signed by complainant's mark, and the certificate of the committing magistrate that complainant subscribed and swore to the same is attached, attestation by a subscribing witness is not necessary.

2. On trial of an indictment perjury testimony of the committing magistrate, and of the clerk who wrote the testimony at the preliminary examination, is admissible to show that the depositions were in accordance with Gen. St. Nev. § 4036, requiring witnesses to be examined in defendant's presence, and an opportunity given him to cross-examine, and providing that the testimony may be reduced to writing, and admitted at the trial, if it has been read over to the witness, and corrected by him, and been subscribed by him and attested by the magistrate.

3. A signature to such depositions by making a mark may be attested by the magistrate as subscribing witness, and it makes no difference if his attestation is written below his jurat.

4. Gen. St. Nev. § 3406, provides that a physician shall not be examined, without the patient's consent, as to information acquired in attending the patient. Held, that on indictment for rape of a child of seven the privilege may be waived by the implied consent of her parents, and the fact that the prosecution was instituted by them, who, with the child, were the principal witnesses, and testified to the nature of the complaint for which the physician prescribed, warrants such implication. BIGELOW, J., dissenting.

5. Under Gen. St. Nev. § 4469, providing that no departure from or error in the proceedings shall render the same invalid unless prejudicial to defendant, a verdict of guilty of rape is not invalidated because the clerk, when ordered to record it, filed it instead, and read from it to the jury, asking if it was their verdict.

6. Under Gen. St. Nev. § 4244, providing that "proof of actual penetration into the body is sufficient to sustain an indictment for rape," the slightest proof will justify submitting the question to the jury, and such proof can be inferred from circumstances. BIGELOW, J., dissenting.

Appeal from district court, Humboldt county; A. L. FITZGERALD, Judge.

M. S. Bonfield, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

MURPHY, J. The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted for the crime of rape upon the person of Bertha May Sadler, of the age of about seven years. The appellant contends that the judgment should be set aside, and a new trial granted, on the following grounds: That the court erred in permitting the prosecuting attorney to read to the jury the complaint upon which the warrant of arrest was issued, and the depositions of Bertha May Sadler, and Lou Alexander. Because no complaint was laid before the magistrate of the commission of a public offense; the magistrate did not examine, on oath, the complainant or prosecutor, nor any witness, and did not require the deposition of any witness to be reduced to writing and subscribed by the witness, or otherwise; it does not appear that any such examination was made or any such deposition taken; the alleged complaint is not signed by the complainant; his alleged mark is not witnessed as required by law, and is not witnessed at all. The complaint is sufficient in form and substance, — it states the title of the court, the name of the party accused, and the nature of the offense charged in ordinary and concise language, and demands the issuing of a warrant for the arrest of the party named therein. The other objection to the complaint is that the party signing his name to the complaint, by making his mark, leaving the name itself to be written by another hand, must have his signature attested by a subscribing witness. The complaint is made in the presence of and filed with the magistrate for his information, and if he is satisfied that a crime has been committed it is his duty to issue a warrant for the arrest of the party named therein, and to notify the accused of the nature of the charge, and the name of the party making the same. The complaint appears to have been made out by or in the presence of the magistrate, the complainant signing the same with his mark, some one else writing the full name of complainant. He then swore to the same, and the magistrate certifies that the same was subscribed and sworn to before him, etc. We think this is all that the law requires. The case of Com. v. Sullivan, 14 Gray, 98, is directly in point, wherein the court said: "But it by no means follows that the signature is not valid without such attesting witness, * * * and in reference to complaints to a justice of the peace, presented by the complainant personally, and accompanied by taking the usual oath to the complaint before such justice, that the same is true, there can be no such necessity. The party virtually acknowledges the complaint as duly signed by him. This must clearly obviate all necessity of further proof of the signature." See, also, Com. v. Quin, 5 Gray, 478. The magistrate is not compelled to examine other witnesses than the complainant before issuing his warrant of arrest. All that the statute requires is that the magistrate should be satisfied that a crime had been committed within his jurisdiction.

The objections urged against the reading of the depositions of Bertha May Sadler and Lou Alexander to the jury are as follows: That they were irrelevant, im-material, and incompetent, and that the proper foundation had not been laid for their introduction, and particularly in this: It does not appear that at the examination witness Bertha was examined in the presence of the defendant, or that he had the privilege of cross-examination; it does not appear that the testimony of said witness was read over to her, and corrected, or that she was given opportunity to correct the same as she might desire; it does not appear that said Bertha subscribed her alleged deposition, or that she refused to sign it. No reason is assigned for such refusal, if any. The alleged mark of said Bertha to said deposition is not witnessed as required by law, or at all. Said alleged deposition is not duly authenticated, is not authenticated at all. Neither of said papers have the slightest ear-mark of a preliminary examination, or of having any connection therewith. They are not certified to be, nor do they purport to be, any part or have any connection with a preliminary examination. The objections to the introduction of the deposition are without any real merit. Section, 4036, Gen. St. reads: "The witnesses shall be examined in the presence of the defendant, and may be cross-examined in his behalf. If either party so desire, the examination shall be by interrogatories, direct and cross: provided, by consent of parties, the testimony may be reduced to writing in narrative form. The testimony so taken may be used by either party on the trial of the cause, and in all proceedings therein, when the witness is sick, out of the state, dead, or when his personal attendance cannot be had in court. When the testimony of each witness is all taken, the same shall be read over to the witness, and corrected, as may be desired, and then subscribed by the witness; or, if he refuses to sign it, the fact of such refusal, and any reason assigned therefor, must be stated, and the same shall be tested by the magistrate. And such testimony, so reduced to writing, and authenticated according to the provisions of this section, shall be filed by the examining magistrate with the clerk of the district court of his county. * * * The caption of said deposition is as follows: "In the justice court, Union township, Humboldt county, Nev. The State of Nevada, Plaintiff, vs. Samuel G. Depoister, Defendant. Bertha May Sadler, being duly sworn, deposes and says." Then follows the testimony given by question and answer, concluding with the signature and jurat, as follows: "BERTHA MAY SADLER, her X mark. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of Aug., 1889. E. S. ARCHER, J. P., and witness to the above signature." The court, over the objections of the defendant, permitted the prosecuting attorney to place on the stand E. S. Archer, the committing magistrate, and W. C. Owens, who wrote down the testimony at the preliminary examination, and they both testified to the fact that the complaint was read over to the defendant; that the depositions were taken and reduced to writing in the presence of the defendant; and that he was given an opportunity to cross-examine the witness Bertha May Sadler; that the testimony was read over to her, and she was given an opportunity to correct the same; and that she signed the same by making her mark in the presence of the witnesses, and the same is attested by the committing magistrate as a witness to her signature, and the mere fact that the magistrate wrote the word, "signature," instead of "mark," or that he has written the words "witness to the above signature" below the jurat, is a mere informality. Webb v. State, 21 Ind. 237. The same is true as to the deposition of Lou Alexander, with the addition that it does appear from the record that the defendant did cross-examine this witness while on the witness stand at the preliminary examination. At common law the certificate of a public officer was not receivable in evidence. The provision making the certificate of the justice admissible is founded upon the reason of statutes authorizing proof of public documents by copies certified by the officer having their custody. "The reason of admitting a copy to be evidence is the inconvenience to the public of removing records which may be wanted in two places at the same time." 1 Starkie, Ev. *251. And so it may be said, as one of the reasons for making the certificate of the justice admissible, that inconvenience to the public would result by compelling his attendance as a witness at a time when the duties of his office required his attention. The purpose of the statute is to afford a reasonable and convenient method of proof. The statute does not in terms exclude other evidence, and we see no reason why the common-law method of proof should not be admitted. Statutes containing provisions similar to those of section 4036 have existed for the last 300 years in England, and have been generally adopted by the states of this Union, and we are not aware that the established rules of decision of any court construe them as abolishing the common-law mode of proof. In the case of People v. Carty, 77 Cal. 214, 19 Pac. Rep. 491, upon the trial, the prosecution offered in evidence the short-hand reporter's transcript of his notes of the testimony taken before the committing magistrate. The certificate attached to this transcript was to the effect that it was a "full, true, and correct transcript of the short-hand notes taken by me herein." One of the objections on the trial was that the document was not properly certified. The reporter was then permitted to be examined as a witness, and he testified "that the document was a correct transcript of the notes taken by him of the testimony and proceedings at the examination before the magistrate." The supreme court held that the document was not admissible, not because the reporter was sworn as a witness to correct his certificate, but because, after he was placed upon the stand, he did not refresh his memory from the writing, and then testify as to what occurred at the examination, and that the notes as taken by him at such examination were correct. He having merely testified as to the correctness of the transcribing, this was not sufficient. In the case of People v. Dowdigan, 67 Mich. 96, 38 N. W. Rep. 920, where the reading of a deposition to the jury was objected to on the grounds that the same had not been read over to the subscribing witness, the defendant was permitted to place the justice on the stand as a witness to try and establish the fact, but he could not swear whether it had been read over to her or not, yet the deposition was admitted. In England it is the custom that when a party signs his name to a deposition taken before a magistrate in a criminal prosecution the proof of the signature may be given by any one that was present at the time of such examination; but when the party signs the deposition with his mark, it must be proved that the deposition was correctly read to the witness, which proof must be made by the magistrate or his clerk. Rex v. Chappel, 1 Moody & R. 395. In the case of State v. Jones, 7 Nev. 415, the court said: "When a deposition is offered, it is true the person offering it should accompany it with proof that it was taken in conformity with the statute; and, if the proper objection be made, it should not be admitted until such preliminary proof is made;" meaning thereby that if the committing magistrate had not attached his certificate to the deposition, the state could have the same corrected, or the prosecution might place witnesses upon the stand to show that the law had been complied with. In Texas, where the statute in relation to the taking of depositions on preliminary examinations is similar to our own, in the case of Clark v. State, the supreme court said: "In our opinion there is no merit in defendant's third and fourth bills of exceptions to the reproduction of the testimony of C. W. Churchwell, which had been reduced to writing upon the examining trial, the witness having subsequently died. The justice of the peace was properly permitted to state the circumstances attending upon the taking of the deceased witness' testimony, and to identify the same." 28 Tex. App. 195, 12 S. W. Rep. 731. In the case of Farnsworth Co. v. Rand, 65 Me. 21, the defendant had levied on property of the plaintiff. The statute of Maine required that the collector should take the oath of a collector. There was no record evidence that the defendant had taken such oath, although he had been sworn in as a constable. The court held that in the absence of record evidence parol proof was competent to prove that the oath had been taken by defendant before making the levy. In the case of People v. Moore, 15 Wend. 421, the justice of the peace was permitted to go upon the stand and testify as to statements made in his court, which statements had been reduced to writing. The defendant then offered to introduce the deposition taken on the examination. The district attorney objected to its introduction, for the reason that it did not appear to have been correctly taken. The justice testified that the deposition was taken in pursuance of the statute, but whether it was read to the witness or not he did not recollect. The objection was sustained. On appeal to the supreme court the judgment was reversed, the court saying: "When the justice swears that the deposition was taken in pursuance of the statute, the presumption is that it was regularly and properly taken. The law presumes every public officer does his duty until the contrary appears. The deposition must therefore be considered properly taken until some irregularity is shown." No particular form is prescribed by law for the certificate of the magistrate to testimony taken before him on a preliminary examination, and a substantial compliance with section 4036 is all that is required, and an error or omission in the certificate can be cured by parol testimony. Draper v. Snow, 20 N. Y. 332.

Objection is made to the admission in evidence of the testimony of Dr. Hanson, the physician who attended the child during illness consequent upon the assault. The statute provides that "a licensed physician or surgeon shall not, without the consent of the patient, be examined as a witness as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Section 3406, Gen. St. Nev. It is conceded, as shown by the record, that either the child or her mother could have given the consent required by the statute. The consent may either be express or implied. Upon this question the supreme court of the United States, in Blackburn v. Crawford, 3 Wall. 194, said: "We think it [the consent] as effectual here by implication as the most explicit language could have made it. It could have been no clearer if the client had expressly enjoined it upon the attorney to give this testimony." * * * A different result would involve a perversion of the rule inconsistent with its object and in direct conflict with the reason upon which it is founded." Applying these principles, the facts of this case establish consent by implication. In the present case the prosecution was inaugurated by the parents of the child. Her step-father laid the complaint before the justice. Her mother and herself were the principal witnesses. The mother testified, among other things, to the statements of the child charging the defendant with the commission of the offense, and to her physical condition, which led to the calling of the physician. Her testimony was of a nature to make public all matters bearing upon the injuries and sufferings of the child as affected by the defendant's acts. It practically disclosed the general nature of the complaint for which the physician prescribed. If any injury could be inflicted by testimony of this nature it was done by the mother's testimony, and, the facts having once been exposed, it would seem that there was no reason why the physician's knowledge should be treated as confidential. At all events, the facts stated show a disposition on the part of the step-father and the mother to prosecute the defendant, and in doing so to waive the protection which the law gave to the confidential information acquired by the physician. It is true, defendant's mother testified that the mother of the child declared she would not again prosecute the defendant; but no other fact was disclosed tending to show such a disposition. The testimony of the physician was introduced in evidence by the prosecution before the defendant's mother testified in his behalf. The court, therefore, knew nothing of the alleged disinclination to prosecute when the physician's testimony was admitted, and no motion to strike it out was ever made. In the case of McKinney v. Railroad Co., 104 N. Y. 354, 10 N. E. Rep. 544, on the first trial of the case, the plaintiff called the physician who had attended her and treated her for the injuries received, and he testified fully as to her injuries. On the second trial, after the plaintiff had closed her case, not having placed the physician on the stand as a witness in her behalf, the defendant called on Chapman, a physician, and proposed to prove by him the injuries claimed to have been suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of the collision in question, as learned by him upon a personal examination of the plaintiff when visiting her as a patient. "The plaintiff objected, upon the grounds that the information acquired by a physician while attending a patient was privileged, and could not, therefore, be admitted against the plaintiff without her consent." "This objection was sustained, the evidence excluded, and the defendant excepted." RUGER, C. J., speaking for the court, said: "Such evidence is made incompetent at the option of the patient only, and in case she elects at any time to remove the seal from the lips of the witness, the evidence may properly be received. * * * The patient cannot use this privilege both as a sword and a shield, to waive when it inures to her advantage, and wield when it does not. After its publication no further injury can be inflicted upon the rights and interests which the statute was intended to protect, and there is no further reason for its enforcement. The nature of the information is of such a character that when it is once divulged in legal proceedings it cannot be again hidden or concealed. It is then open to the consideration of the entire public, and the privilege of forbidding its repetition is not conferred by the statute. The consent having been once given and acted upon cannot be recalled, and the patient can never be restored to the condition which the statute, from motives of public policy, has sought to protect. * * * The object of the statute having been voluntarily defeated by the party for whose benefit it was enacted, there can be no reason for its continued enforcement in such cases." The judgment was reversed. Johnson v. Johnson, 14 Wend. 641. In the case of Pierson v. People, 79 N. Y. 432, the defendant was charged with the crime of murder, by poisoning one Withey. Dr. Coe, a practicing physician, was called to see him by the prisoner; and he examined him and prescribed for him. On the trial the doctor was called as a witness for the people, and the following question put to him: "State the condition in which you found Withey at that time, both from your own observation and from what he told you." The prisoner's counsel objected to this question, on the ground that the information which the witness obtained was obtained as a physician, and that he had no right to disclose it; that the evidence offered was prohibited by the statute. The court overruled the objection, and the witness testified as to the condition in which he found Withey from an examination then openly made in the presence of Withey's wife and the prisoner, and as he also learned it from Withey, his wife, and the prisoner. The court then quotes the statute of New York, which ours is copied from. "Such evidence was not prohibited at common law. The design of the provision was to place the information of the physician, obtained from his patient in a professional way, substantially on the same footing with the information obtained by an attorney professionally of his client's affair. The purpose was to enable a patient to make such disclosures to his physician as to his ailments, under the seal of confidence, as would enable the physician intelligently to prescribe for him, to invite confidence between physician and patient, and to prevent a breach thereof. * * * It could not have been designed to shut out such evidence as was here received, and thus to protect the murderer rather than to shield the memory of his victim. If the construction of the statute contended for by the prisoner's counsel must prevail it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, in most cases of murder by poisoning, to convict the murderer. Undoubtedly such evidence has been generally received in this class of cases, and it has not been understood among lawyers and judges to be within the prohibition of the statute. * * * The plain purpose of this statute, as in substance before stated, was to enable a patient to make known his condition to his physician without the danger of any disclosure by him, which would annoy the feelings, damage the character, or impair the standing of the patient while living, or disgrace his memory when dead; * * * that the purpose for which the aid of this statute is invoked, in this case, is so utterly foreign to the purposes and objects of the act, and so diametrically opposed to any intention which the legislature can be supposed to have had in the enactment, so contrary to and inconsistent with its spirit, which most clearly intended to protect the patient, and not to shield one who is charged with his murder, that in such a case the statute is not to be so construed as to be used as a weapon of defense to the party so charged, instead of a protection to his victim." 1 Starkie, Ev. *70; Hewitt v. Prime, 21 Wend. 79; Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 580, 9 N. E. Rep. 326.

The objection of the defendant to the verdict of the jury is not tenable. It appears from the record that when the jury returned into court they were asked by the judge if they had agreed upon a verdict. They answered that they had, and at the same time the foreman handed to the judge the paper upon which the verdict was written, who in turn handed it to the clerk, with instructions to record the same, but instead thereof the clerk filed the paper, and read therefrom to the jury, and the clerk asked each of said jurors if that was their verdict as read by him, and each of said jurors, answering for himself, said it was. Would the mere act of making a copy of the verdict, in pencil writing, in the rough minutes of the court, make it any more sacred? It is not claimed that the defendant was in any manner injured by the receiving, filing, and reading of the verdict, and it is not claimed that the verdict as returned by the jury is not the one upon which judgment has been pronounced by the court. People v. Gilbert, 57 Cal. 97. Section 4469, Gen. St., reads: "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this act in respect to any pleadings or proceedings, nor an error or mistake therein, shall render the same invalid, unless it have actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice in respect to a substantial right."

The contention of appellant's counsel that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence, on account of the absence of positive proof of penetration, is without merit. Section 4244, Gen. St., reads: "Proof of actual penetration into the body is sufficient to sustain an indictment for rape." Under this statute we shall hold the slightest proof of the commission of the offense will justify the judge in submitting the question of fact to the jury, and no form of words is necessary to prove the commission of the crime. The proof, therefore, can be inferred from circumstances apart from the statements of the party injured. The prosecuting witness testified as to the position occupied by the defendant at the time of the commission of the offense, and it was such as to satisfy the minds of the jurors that the crime of rape had been committed, and the physician by whom she was examined found injuries upon her person which such an act might have occasioned. Brauer v. State, 25 Wis. 415; People v. Crowley, 102 N. Y. 237, 6 N. E. Rep. 384; Taylor v. State, 111 Ind. 280, 12 N. E. Rep. 400; State v. Tarr, 28 Iowa, 397; Bishop, St. Crimes, § 488. If the doctrines contended for by counsel for appellant should prevail, then the scoundrel who attempted the chastity of a child or a young girl would escape punishment merely because of her youth preventing his fully consummating the crime, which appears to us as undesirable as it would be unjust. In this case the circumstances prove the commission of the offense beyond a doubt; the intent of the accused is fully proved by his acts; the jury so found. Judgment affirmed.

BIGELOW, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to agree with my learned associates in the conclusion reached by them in this case. If we are at liberty to consider the sufficiency of the evidence given upon the trial, it seems open to grave question as to whether the defendant was proven guilty beyond reasonable doubt of the crime of which he has been convicted. It seems to me that the evidence as reported preponderates so greatly against the verdict that it must have been the result of passion or prejudice. The defendant was charged with a most heinous offense; one that would naturally arouse the indignant feelings of a community to such an extent as to render it quite probable that they were communicated to the jury, and secured a conviction upon evidence that would have been entirely insufficient in other cases. Lord Hale's remark that such an accusation is one easily made, hard to prove, and still harder to be defended by one ever so innocent, has been often repeated and acted upon since by courts all over the land. Iowa has found it necessary to enact a law forbidding a conviction for the crime of rape upon the testimony of the prosecutrix alone. State v. McLaughlin, 44 Iowa, 82. In Gazley v. State, 17 Tex. App. 267, a conviction upon testimony strikingly like that given in this case was reversed as against the evidence. The opinion also shows how little reliance should be placed upon medical testimony, such as was given in the case at bar. Other courts have often set aside verdicts in rape cases upon similar grounds. People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221; People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540; People v. Brown, 47 Cal. 447; People v. Ardaga, 51 Cal. 371; People v. Hulse, 3 Hill, 309; Mathews v. State, 19 Neb. 330, 27 N. W. Rep. 234; State v. Spidle, (Kan.) 22 Pac. Rep. 620; State v. Burdgorf, 53 Mo. 65; and numerous others. Judging from the evidence the child's associations had not been such as were likely to leave her mind as innocent of all knowledge of such things as we generally expect children of her age to be. She testifies that the assault was committed in her mother's home, on Thursday, the 20th day of June, 1889; and that before they had time to adjust their clothing, the mother returned, and was let in by the girl. There seems to have been nothing, however, to arouse her suspicions of anything wrong, and she had none. The prosecutrix made no complaint, and showed no signs of injury, until two days thereafter, when she complained of being chafed, which was attended to by the mother. The next day she complained more, and walked in a peculiar manner, but did not know what was the matter with her, and made no complaint of ill usage. Ten days thereafter a physician was called, who determined she was suffering with the gonorrhea. Some time after this she charged this offense upon the defendant, who was her mother's brother. No attempt, however, was made to prosecute him until August 4th, when her step-father swore to a complaint in the justice court, and he was arrested. Upon the preliminary examination her testimony was taken briefly in answer to the most leading questions by the district attorney. The defendant was unrepresented by counsel, and there was no cross-examination; nor was any attempt made by any one to ascertain her competency as a witness, within Gen. St. § 3402. The only evidence tending to corroborate her in the slightest degree was that of the physician, who testified that he found the vagina unnaturally distended, and was of the opinion that she had the gonorrhea; that this distension might happen from other causes than sexual connection; and that he made no microscopic examination to determine whether she had the disease mentioned. The defendant's counsel contends that this, at most, shows only an attempt to commit rape, and I feel justified in saying that this contention is fully borne out by the evidence. The girl does not testify to anything more than an attempt, and the circumstances are conclusive that this attempt, if made, was not successful. That a full-grown man could succeed in penetrating the body of a child of that age, and there be no cries or tears, no complaints, and no signs of distress, is, it seems to me, contrary to both reason and experience. It is incredible that she would not cry out from the pain that would inevitably be inflicted by such violence, and exhibit some signs of suffering, that could not be concealed. The medical authorities agree that there would be great laceration, a flow of blood, and much pain and suffering produced upon the victim. 3 Whart. & S. Med. Jur. §§ 219, 220. The evidence in Burk v. State, 3 Tex. App. 336, shows what could be expected in such a case. "A full and complete connection between an adult male and a child under twelve years of age is, on the first attempt, manifestly impossible." (3 Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 218,) and it must be still more impossible with a child of only seven. The testimony of the physician concerning the child's diseased condition, while doubtless going very far with the jury, was really entitled to but very little weight, for the reasons: (1) It was not shown that the defendant had the gonorrhea,—a most important consideration. (2) The disease might have been communicated to her by some other person, or in some other manner than by sexual intercourse. 3 Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 222. (3) Other diseases could easily be mistaken for gonorrhea. Upon this last point, in section 223 of the last quoted authors, it is said: "Leucorrhœa and gangrenous inflammation of the vulva are diseases which often arise spontaneously in young children, especially of the poorer class, and are due to bad diet, uncleanness, scrofulous taint, and epidemic influences. In the minds of anxious relatives they may awaken suspicions of violence with intent to commit rape, and sometimes form the occasion for criminal prosecutions against innocent persons for the sake of gain. Leucorrhœa may be easily mistaken for gonorrhea, for the discharge in the two diseases is nearly similar, and the local symptoms are so much alike as to render a positive opinion, in legal cases, rather hazardous." And again, (section 227:) "Within the last few weeks a child of nine years of age was brought to me, upon whom it was suspected that violence had been inflicted. A careful examination afforded evidence that the case was simply one of vaginitis. There was complete absence of any indication of violence, for although it can scarcely be believed to be possible that sexual entrance into the vagina of an infant could, under any circumstances, be perpetrated, yet, in the attempt, much confusion of the young and delicate soft parts must have ensued had it been made." Many instances of this kind are given in the books, where the parents' erroneous suspicions have even been confirmed by the hasty and ill-considered opinions of physicians, given without making a proper examination. Cases are by no means rare where the necessity of accounting for the condition of what was supposed to be venereal disease has, under the persistent questioning and threats of anxious relatives, led the child into accusing some wholly innocent person of tampering with her. 3 Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 229. Quite possibly this was the case here. It was only after the physician was called, and he had pronounced the disease gonorrhea, that the accusation was made against the defendant, and apparently not for some days after this. The necessity then existed of accusing some one, and it is quite evident that had it not been for this necessity the assault, if it was really made, would never have been made known by the child. The admission of the stepfather's affidavit, made in the justice court, showing that he believed the defendant guilty, was very prejudicial to his case, although its admission, as against the objections urged, was probably not error. The same may be said of the evidence concerning the particulars of the assault, as related by Bertha to her mother, when she finally accused the defendant of the offense. Such statements were mere hearsay, and their admission was considered sufficient to call for the reversal of a conviction for the same kind of an offense in State v. Campbell, 20 Nev. 122, 17 Pac. Rep. 620, and doubtless would have worked the same result here had the testimony been particularly objected to. But, although it was not, and consequently its admission was not error, it was equally as prejudicial to him as though it had been admitted against his most strenuous opposition, and probably goes far towards accounting for the verdict. For these reasons I think the conviction should be set aside as contrary to the evidence.

I agree that under the great weight of authority construing statutes similar to our own the depositions taken upon the preliminary examination were sufficiently proven to admit them as evidence in the case. The authentication required by Gen. St. § 4036, seems to be the signing by the witness and testing by the magistrate, as previously provided for in the section, and which had been done here. For the same reason the oral testimony, showing that the witnesses were examined in the presence of the defendant, etc., was properly admitted.

Dr. Hanson's testimony should not have been received. Section 4576, Gen. St., makes the rules for determining the competency of witnesses in civil cases applicable to criminal cases. Section 3406 provides: "A licensed physician or surgeon shall not, without the consent of his patient, be examined as a witness as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." The information concerning which he must not be examined includes not only knowledge received from the lips of the patient, but also from the statements of others who surround him at the time, or from observation of his appearance or condition. Grattan v. Metropolitan Co.,

80 N. Y. 297. The intent of the statute in making such information privileged "was to enable a patient to make known his condition to his physician without the danger of any disclosure by him, which would annoy the feelings, damage the character, or impair the standing of the patient while living, or disgrace his memory when dead." Pierson v. People, 79 N. Y. 434. But notwithstanding the quotations made by my associates from the opinion in Pierson v. People, supra, in which it was held that the New York statute, of which ours is a substantial copy, did not apply to a case of murder by poisoning, and that, consequently, the physician's testimony was admissible, I do not understand them to hold that the statute is not applicable here, but that the ruling in admitting the testimony is sustained upon the ground that such "consent" to the physician testifying had been given as made it competent. The statute reads that the physician "shall not, without the consent of his patient, be examined as a witness," etc. There is no pretense here that the "patient" had given this consent, but its admissibility is placed upon the ground that the patient's parents, step-father and mother, have given implied consent to his testifying, and this, of course, must necessarily assume that the parents have the power to give the required consent, and to waive, for their children, the protection of the statute. But that they do not have this power seems to me reasonably clear from both the letter and spirit of the statute. It does not say that the physician's testimony shall not be admitted without the consent of the patient, or his parents or guardian, or executor or administrator, but the patient alone is mentioned. If it be objected that under such construction his testimony would always be lost where the patient was too young to give consent, or was insane, or dead, it may be replied that this is just what the statute was intended to do. It intended to place the information so obtained upon the same footing as communications between husband and wife, communications to an attorney, or confessions to a clergyman or priest. Such evidence is always to be incompetent except in the single instance of where the party in whose interest it is excluded is able to, and does, give his free consent to its divulgence. In Westover v. Insurance Co., 99 N. Y. 56, 1 N. E. Rep. 104, the action was brought upon a life insurance policy issued to the plaintiff's testator. Upon the trial the plaintiff called a physician who had attended the deceased during his life-time, and asked him certain questions concerning the condition in which he had found him. To this the defendant, the insurance company, objected that the evidence was incompetent and privileged under the statute. This, of course, raised the question whether, the patient being dead, his executor could give the consent necessary to authorize its admission, and it was held he could not. In the course of the opinion the court says: "There does not seem to be left any room for construction. The sections are absolute and unqualified. These provisions of law are founded upon public policy, and, in all cases where they apply, the seal of the law must remain until it is removed by the person confessing, or the patient or client. * * * Whenever the evidence comes within the purview of the statutes, it is absolutely prohibited, and may be objected to by any one unless it be waived by the person for whose benefit and protection the statutes were enacted." Nor do I understand that it has been conceded by any one that the mother could have given the consent required by the statute. Certainly, to my mind, it has not been done by the defendant or his counsel. But admitting that the parents could give the required consent, the next question is whether they have done so. That there may be implied as well as express consent, there can be no doubt, but the evidence of this implied consent or waiver must be distinct and unequivocal. 1 Whart. Er. § 584. Hageman, Priv. Com. § 151; Westover v. Insurance Co., 99 N. Y. 59, 1 N. E. Rep. 104. It is supposed that the evidence shows a determination by the parents of the child to prosecute the defendant, and that, consequently, they intended to waive the protection of the statute for the child. Admit the premises, and the conclusion does not by any means follow. There is no logical connection between them. If this is to be the rule, then, in a case where it is supposed the evidence shows that the party to make the waiver does not desire the defendant prosecuted, it must be presumed that he has not consented. Before we can even speculate upon such a state of facts we must know how strong the desire for the defendant's conviction or acquittal is, how much or how little they cared for the physician's knowledge being made public, and all the other considerations that might influence them. It is sufficient to say that this would be no rule at all for the admission or rejection of evidence, and is entirely inadmissible. Nor does the fact that the mother appeared and testified upon the preliminary examination to the daughter's ailments constitute any such waiver or consent. She appeared the same as other witnesses, presumably in obedience to a subpoena, and it was not a matter of choice with her whether she would testify or not. If asked the questions, she must answer. It seems like going a good ways to hold that, because she was compelled to testify, therefore her testimony constitutes implied consent to the physician making public the information obtained by him. Nothing ought to constitute implied consent that is not voluntary. But, again, the testimony of the mother did not make public the information of the physician. She did not pretend to know what was the matter with the child, and the symptoms she described might have come from a dozen other sources than venereal disease. She supposed for some time that she was simply chafed. Even the assumption that at the time of the trial in the district court, when the physician's testimony was admitted, either the child or her parents wished to prosecute the defendant, is not supported by the evidence. It is founded upon the circumstances of the step-father having made the complaint in the justice court, and that the mother and child had appeared and testified upon the hearing. Weak as this foundation is, it is further weakened by the uncontradicted evidence of two witnesses that before the trial they had taken back much they had said against the defendant in the depositions, declared they had only so testified because of the threats and promises of Joseph Alexander, the step-father, and that they would never testify against him again. That this was their feeling towards him is further borne out by the fact that neither of them was present at the trial. If the step-father ever had any right to consent for the girl, it was certainly lost when her own father appeared and took possession and control of her, as he had already done. But in my judgment the whole theory of implying consent from any such premises is wrong. While it may be implied as well as expressed, the implication should be based upon substantial, clear, and unequivocal grounds, such as do not exist here. See People v. Murphy, 101 N. Y. 126, 4 N. E. Rep. 326; People v. Stout, 3 Park. Crim. R. 670. If the evidence of physicians ought not to be received in rape cases or in criminal cases, the remedy is with the legislature. As said in Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 580, 9 N. E. Rep. 320: "It is probably true that the statute, as we feel obliged to construe it, will work considerable mischief. In testamentary cases, where the contest relates to the competency of the testator, it will exclude the evidence of physicians, which is generally the most important and decisive. . . . But the remedy is with the legislature, and not with the courts." But the truth is, there is just as much reason for excluding such evidence in criminal cases as in any other. The inevitable result of the statute is to exclude evidence that would often be of the highest importance, but as a matter of public policy it is considered better that such testimony should be lost than that the confidence which ought to exist between priest and penitent, lawyer and client, and physician and patient, should be destroyed by the knowledge that they may be compelled to divulge the information so obtained from those who have placed trust in them. The minutes of the court show that after the jury was impaneled and sworn, the defendant's plea of not guilty was entered, and they do not show that he had ever pleaded prior to that time; but, believing that the conviction should be reversed for the foregoing reasons, I have not considered this point, nor the one concerning the verdict.

STATE ex rel. NOOKSACK RIVER BOOM CO.
v. SUPERIOR COURT OF WHATCOM COUNTY

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 16, 1891.)

WHEN PROHIBITION LIES—MANDAMUS—APPEAL.

1. Prohibition will not lie to restrain the superior court from further proceedings in an application for mandamus where the writ has already issued, and no application was made at the hearing, by motion or plea, to test the jurisdiction of the court in the premises.

2. Where defendant has submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court by giving notice of appeal from its judgment granting the writ, the subsequent filing of an answer and of a motion to vacate the judgment are of no effect to entitle him to the writ of prohibition.

3. It is error for the superior court to deny defendant's motion to stay the mandamus pending his appeal, and to fix the amount of the bond therefor, as Code Wash. § 701, provides that appeals may be taken from judgments directing writs of mandate in like manner and with like effect as in civil actions.

On petition for writ of prohibition to Whatcom county.

Evans, Sherman & Husard, for defendant.

STILES, J. On the 3d day of November, 1890, the relator, the Nooksack River Boom Company, and the Bellingham Bay Boom Company, were rival corporations organized under the act of March 17, 1890, entitled "An act to declare and regulate the powers, rights, and duties of corporations organized to build booms, and catch logs and timber products therein." Laws 1889-90, p. 470. Both companies had their booms and works at the mouth of the Nooksack river, in Whatcom county; but the Nooksack Company's boom was so much higher up, or further within the mouth of the river that logs floating down the river would reach its boom first; and, its boom being thus located, it had caught large quantities of logs floating down the river, some of which were the property of persons who had made arrangements with the Bellingham Bay Company to raft and boom their logs, or, as it is termed in the papers here and in the act, "consigned" their logs to that company. The Bellingham Bay Company claimed and demanded that all such consigned logs be passed by the Nooksack Company free of charge, and be allowed to float on unhindered into the works of the former; but the Nooksack Company denied this claim, and refused this demand, unless paid the sum of 75 cents per 1,000 feet, board measure, of the logs so detained, as permitted by the act in certain cases. Upon this the Bellingham Bay Company, deeming itself aggrieved at the action and demand of the Nooksack Company, sought redress by applying to the superior court of Whatcom county for a writ of mandamus requiring the latter company to follow its construction of the law and let the logs go free, both as to those detained and as to all others which should thereafter be floated down the Nooksack river under consignment to its care. The method of presenting this application for a mandamus was as follows: On the 3d day of November the attorneys of the Bellingham Bay Company delivered to Messrs. Harris, Black & Leaming, who were attorneys resident at Whatcom, and who, it appears, had theretofore been the usual attorneys of the Nooksack Company, a notice in writing, purporting to be a notice in a cause in the superior court, and having as a caption the title of the court, and "Bellingham Bay Boom Company, Plaintiff, vs. Nooksack River Boom Company, Defendant." It was addressed "to said defendant," and proceeded to give notice that at 2 o'clock P. M. on November

6, 1890, the plaintiff would apply to the superior court of Whatcom county for the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the defendant to pass the logs in question, etc. Reference was made in the notice to a "copy of motion and affidavits herewith served," and it was stated at the close of the notice that, "if you desire, you may appear at said time, and resist the issuance of said writ." It was signed by the attorney of the plaintiff. The "motion" was a document bearing a caption exactly like that of the notice, and was substantially in the form of a complaint in a civil action, and prayed a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the defendant to remove the obstructions it had placed in the way of the passage through its boom of all logs consigned to the plaintiff, and to at once pass and permit to be passed, free of charge, all logs so consigned to it, and bearing certain proprietary marks, and any and all logs which in the future should be consigned to the plaintiff's boom. The motion was verified in the manner in which complaints are required to be verified, and to it were attached sundry affidavits of third persons, whose logs were among those alleged to be detained, who described their property, and stated various facts going to show a detention by the defendant. Harris, Black & Leaming indorsed upon a copy of the notice delivered to them: "Service of above notice accepted, and copies received, this 3d day of November, 1890," and signed themselves "Attys. for Deft." The motion and supporting affidavits were filed in the superior court on the 6th day of November, but (probably through an oversight) the notice, with its acceptance of service, was not filed until November 8th. At the hour noticed, 2 o'clock, November 6th, the business before the superior court, with a jury in attendance, was suspended, in order that the plaintiff might make his application for a mandamus. One member of the firm of Harris, Black & Leaming, at least, was present in the court to represent the defendant; and, both sides having been asked if they were ready to proceed, answered in the affirmative. The defendant's attorney thereupon orally objected to the court's taking any action upon the application, claiming that the procedure by motion was unauthorized; that it should have been commenced by the filing of a complaint and the issuance of a summons; that, not having been so commenced, the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant; that there had been no service upon the defendant, but merely a notice to certain attorneys supposed to represent it; and that, finally, if the proper practice in mandamus was by motion, there must first be an alternative writ, which should be served upon the defendant, to which a return could be made at a time to be fixed in the writ. The court declined to recognize the objections thus made unless the defendant's attorney would appear in the proceeding by some plea in writing, and urged him to file such papers as he deemed material; but this the attorney refused, and requested the court first to rule whether the plaintiff had any standing upon the proceeding by motion, to which the court again declined to accede. Defendant's attorney then contented himself with his position, and plaintiff's attorneys demanded that the relief asked be allowed as matter of course. The court took the matter under advisement until the next day, and on the morning of November 7th, at the opening of the court, announced an oral decision in favor of the plaintiff, and granted the peremptory writ; whereupon the defendant's attorney, without waiting for the formal entry of the judgment, or the issuance of the writ, or making any motion or appearance, gave notice of an appeal from the judgment to this court, which notice was entered upon the minutes of the court by the clerk. Shortly after giving notice of appeal, on the same day, and without the knowledge or leave of the court, defendant's attorneys filed with the clerk a purported answer to the motion for the writ, supported by a number of affidavits. On the afternoon of the same day the plaintiff's attorneys submitted to the court proposed forms of a judgment and writ, in accordance with the oral decision, which, after inspection by defendant's attorney, on November 8th, the court ordered to be entered and issued as of November 7th. The writ was served upon the defendant on the 8th day of November, by the sheriff of Whatcom county; and on the same day the defendant filed a motion to stay the writ pending its appeal, and to fix the amount of a bond therefor, which motion, after argument, the court denied, November 10th. On the 12th of November the defendant also filed a motion in the superior court to vacate its judgment and recall its writ, but this motion was not heard or otherwise disposed of. This completes the material part of the history of the case in the superior court. On the 12th day of November the relator, the defendant below, applied to this court for a supersedeas to stay any further action in the case in the superior court until the cause could be heard on the appeal, and for a writ of prohibition to restrain that court from any further proceedings whatever, other than the signing of a bill of exceptions. This application was granted to the extent of an order to show cause why such relief should not be given, with a temporary restraining order until the matter could be heard; and from the return of Hon. J. R. WINN, judge of the superior court of Whatcom county, to the order to show cause, we gather the facts as above stated, with the exception of those preceding the appearance of the parties in that court.

Upon this state of facts the question is, what should be done? having due regard to the accomplishment of justice, and the presentation of a dignified and orderly course of procedure in the courts of the state. This court undoubtedly has the power to issue writs of prohibition to the superior courts of the state in proper cases, but in so doing it must be guided by the rules of law applicable to such extraordinary proceedings, and must not in any case overstep the bounds of necessity, in any spirit of zeal for the redress of what it deems an injustice. To justify the issuance of a writ of prohibition from a superior to an inferior court it must clearly appear—First, that the inferior court is about to take jurisdiction of a matter of which by law it has no jurisdiction; secondly, that there is still something which the inferior court is about to do under its claim of jurisdiction; thirdly, that an application has been made to the inferior court for a decision that it has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter involved, which has been refused; and, fourthly, that there is no other proper remedy. Measuring by these requisites, we should not be warranted in granting the writ of prohibition at this time. Before the application was made to this court the jurisdiction had been taken and exercised by the superior court, and its judgment had been entered, and its writ issued and served; therefore nothing remained for it to do in the case. True, upon a refusal of the defendant to obey the writ, the court could attach its officers, and punish them by fine and imprisonment; but it might never have done so, and it was not threatening to do so on the 12th day of November. No proper application was made to that court to test the question of its jurisdiction over the subject-matter, if, indeed, that subject was mentioned at all in the discussion at the hearing. The practice in mandamus, and the question whether there was jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, were discussed informally, without plea or motion; but, for all it amounted to, the attorney for the defendant might as well have remained mute, or absented himself entirely. The writ was allowed substantially ex parte, the defendant merely standing by as a spectator. Subsequently an answer was filed, and the court was asked to rehear the matter, and a motion was made to vacate the judgment and recall the writ; but these attempts came after the notice of appeal, which operated as a general appearance of the defendant, and cut off all further proceedings in the superior court excepting those necessary to the perfection of the appeal. Had the relator, without giving its notice of appeal, and thus submitting its person to the jurisdiction, at once applied to this court for a writ of prohibition on the ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding, viz., of a proceeding in mandamus to enforce the asserted rights of the plaintiff, the result of its application might have been entirely different; but we do not pass upon that matter, for the reason that it seems to be necessarily involved in the case coming before us on appeal. It remains to be considered whether there is any other relief in the premises to which the relator is entitled. It is shown by the record that on the 8th day of November the relator applied to the superior court, by motion, to have the amount of its bond on appeal fixed, and for a stay of proceedings under the judgment and writ of mandamus pending the appeal, which motion the court denied on the 10th of November, on the ground that the filing of a bond would not act as a supersedeas or stay of execution of the writ of mandamus. And herein, as we view the matter, lies the true cause of complaint of the relator. The writ of mandamus being originally, in its English origin, a writ of the highest prerogative character, was, for that reason, excepted from the category of judicial decrees which were suspended by an appeal to a higher court. But in the United States, with but few, if any, exceptions, the idea of prerogative has been abandoned, and the writ has come to be regarded much in the nature of an ordinary action between the parties, to be issued or not according as the party aggrieved may or may not show himself entitled to that peculiar species of relief; or, in other words, an action for the enforcement of a right in cases where the law affords no other adequate means of redress. And a judgment in a mandamus proceeding, as in case of an ordinary action at law, is subject to review by writ of error or appeal upon like conditions as in other cases. See High, Ext. Rem. § 4, and notes of cases. Now, this modern and American theory of mandamus would seem to place this remedy, and the judgment and writ consequent upon it, precisely on a level with ordinary judgments and orders of courts in other cases; and it is a well-settled rule that while a supersedeas bond does not stay any part of a judgment which commands the party against whom it runs to refrain from doing any act covered by the judgment, yet, where the judgment requires a party to perform some affirmative act, an appeal stays the immediate necessity for the performance, and prevents the court which rendered the judgment from punishing as a contempt the failure to perform, until the conclusion of the case on appeal. But if there be any doubt as to the general rules thus rehearsed, and their application to the proceeding in mandamus, we hold it to be clearly resolved in this state by section 701 of the Code, which declares that not only may appeals or writs of error be taken from judgments directing writs of mandate, but that they may be taken "in like manner and [with like] effect as in civil actions." Therefore, inasmuch as the peremptory writ in this case, in so far as it had any legal effect, commanded the relator to do an act which it seeks by its appeal to relieve itself from doing, and the doing or not doing of which is the kernel of the whole controversy, it is proper that, under sufficient security that it will obey the judgment and writ if the final determination of the cause on appeal be against it, it should have had the amount of such a security fixed, and upon the filing of its bond all proceedings looking to the enforcement of the writ should have been stayed. In refusing this right the superior court erred, and the correction of its error is, we conclude, the proper remedy to apply. This conclusion, when carried out, will be substantially a mandamus to the superior court of Whatcom county requiring it to fix the bond as prayed for in the defendant's motion of November 8th, the effect of which bond, when filed, will be to stay any further proceedings looking towards the enforcement of the writ. Let an order to that effect issue, costs to the relator.

WATER, LIGHT, AND SEWERAGE SYSTEMS.

1. Const. Wash. art. 8, § 6, fixes the limit of municipal indebtedness at  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the taxable property of the corporation, with a permission to increase the indebtedness to 5 per cent. for strictly municipal purposes on the assent of three-fifths of the qualified voters therein. It further provides that, with a similar assent, cities may incur an indebtedness to the extent of an additional 5 per cent., for water, light, and sewerage systems. Held that, as the matter of providing water, sewer, and lights for the inhabitants of a city is a strictly municipal purpose, the expense of the construction and maintenance of such works may be paid either out of the current revenues or the first 5 per cent. of indebtedness, as well as out of the additional 5 per cent. specially authorized for that purpose.

2. Act Wash. Feb. 26, 1890, (Sess. Laws, 225,) likewise fixes the limit of municipal indebtedness at  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the taxable property of the corporation, and provides (section 2) that it may be increased to 5 per cent., with the assent of three-fifths of the qualified voters therein; while section 3 authorizes an additional indebtedness of 5 per cent. for the construction of water, light, and sewerage systems. Act March 26, 1890, (Sess. Laws, 520,) relates solely to the construction of water, light, and sewerage systems, and prescribes in detail the procedure to be followed, and provides that, if the indebtedness is to be paid out of the current funds, only a majority vote is necessary, but that, if bonds are to be issued, the assent of three-fifths of the voters is necessary. Held that, as these two acts were passed at the same session, they must be construed together; that Act Feb. 26th was not repealed by Act March 26th; and that, where a three-fifths majority has been obtained in favor of bonding a city for the construction of water, light, and sewerage systems, no further obstacle to the issuance of such bonds exists, though they may amount to more than 5 per cent. of the taxable property of the city, provided, with their issuance, the total indebtedness is not increased to more than 10 per cent.

3. The majority required by the constitution in favor of the issuance of bonds by the city being three-fifths of the "voters therein voting at an election to be held for that purpose," a three-fifths majority of the electors actually voting on the proposition is all that is necessary, and not three-fifths of all the persons who may be entitled to a vote.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

Action by James B. Metcalf against the city of Seattle and others, involving the power of the city of Seattle to issue bonds for the construction of water and sewerage systems. There was a judgment in defendants' favor, and plaintiff appeals.

Const. Wash. art. 8, § 6, provides: "No county, city, town, school-district, or other municipal corporation shall for any purpose become indebted in any manner to an amount exceeding one and one-half per centum of the taxable property in such county, city, town, school-district, or other municipal corporation, without the assent of three-fifths of the voters therein, voting at an election to be held for that purpose; nor in cases requiring such assent shall the total indebtedness at any time exceed five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county purposes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness, except that in incorporated cities the assessment shall be taken from the last assessment for city purposes: provided, that no part of the indebtedness allowed in this section shall be incurred for any purpose other than strictly county, city, town, school-district, or other municipal purposes: provided, further, that any city or town, with such assent, may be allowed to become indebted to a larger amount, but not exceeding 5 per centum additional, for supplying such city or town with water, artificial light, and sewers, when the works for supplying such water, light, and sewers shall be owned and controlled by the municipality."

Act Wash. Feb. 26, 1890, (Sess. Laws, 1889-90, pp. 225-227,) is as follows: "An act authorizing and empowering cities and towns organized prior to the adoption of the state constitution to extend their credit and to fund their indebtedness, and validating certain indebtedness already contracted, and declaring an emergency to exist. Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Washington: Section 1. That any city or town having a corporate existence in this state at the time of the adoption of the constitution thereof is hereby authorized and empowered to borrow money and to contract indebtedness in any other manner for general municipal purposes, not exceeding in amount, together with the existing general indebtedness of such city or town, one and one-half per centum of the taxable property in such city or town, to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county purposes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness, except that in incorporated cities the assessment shall be taken from the last assessment for city purposes, whenever it is deemed advisable to do so by the city or town council thereof. Sec. 2. That any such city or town may borrow money or contract indebtedness for strictly municipal purposes over the amount specified in the preceding section, but not exceeding in amount, together with the existing general indebtedness, five per centum of the taxable property in such city or town, to be ascertained as provided in the preceding section, through the council of such city or town, whenever three-fifths of the voters therein assent thereto at an election to be held for that purpose at such time, upon such reasonable notice and in the manner presented by the city or town council, not inconsistent with the general election laws. Sec. 3. That any city or town described in the first section of this act shall, in addition to the power granted in the preceding sections, have the power, through its council, to borrow money, or to contract indebtedness, in an amount not exceeding five per centum of the taxable property in such city or town, ascertained as provided in the first section thereof, for the purpose of supplying such city or town with water, artificial light, or sewers, when the plant or plants used for such purposes shall be owned and controlled by the city, whenever three-fifths of the voters therein assent thereto at an election to be held for that purpose, according to the provisions of section two of this act. Sec. 4. That any city or town of the description of those included in the first section of this act may fund its indebtedness at any time in such a manner, for such time and upon such terms and interest as its council may deem advisable: provided, that the indebtedness funded shall not, with all the existing indebtedness, exceed in amount one and one-half per centum of the taxable property thereof, ascertained as provided in the first section hereof, unless such indebtedness shall have been authorized by the assent of three-fifths of the voters of such city or town, as hereinbefore provided. Sec. 5. That any indebtedness now owing by any such city or town, contracted strictly for municipal purposes, whether the same exceeds the amount which such city or town was authorized to contract under its charter or not, is hereby validated and declared to be a binding obligation upon such city or town when the only ground of the invalidity of such indebtedness is that it exceeds the amount authorized by the charter of such city or town: provided that, if said indebtedness exceeds one and one-half per centum, including present indebtedness, upon the taxable property therein, to be ascertained as hereinbefore provided, then such indebtedness shall not be deemed to be validated by this act till three-fifths of the voters in such city or town shall assent to the same, at an election held for that purpose, in the manner provided by section two of this act: provided, further, that the indebtedness ratified, including all existing indebtedness, shall not exceed in amount five per centum upon the taxable property in such city or town, ascertained as hereinbefore indicated: and provided, further, that this section shall only apply to indebtedness now existing. Sec. 6. That when this act comes in conflict with any provision, limitation, or restriction in any local or special law or charter existing at the time that the constitution of the state of Washington was adopted, this statute shall govern and control. Sec. 7. That, whereas, many of the cities and towns of this state are seriously embarrassed in the making of needed improvements by restrictions in their charters, preventing them from extending their credit to the present constitutional limit, an emergency exists for the immediate effect of this law, and the same shall take effect therefor from and after its passage."

Act Wash. March 26, 1890, (Sess. Laws 1889-90, pp. 520-522:.) "An act authorizing cities and towns to construct internal improvements, and to issue bonds to pay therefor, and declaring an emergency. Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Washington: Section 1. That any incorporated city or town within the state be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, or condemn and purchase, or purchase or add to and maintain, water-works within or without the city limits for the purpose of furnishing the city and the inhabitants thereof with an ample supply of water for all purposes, and to construct and maintain a system of sewerage, with full jurisdiction and authority to manage, regulate, and control the same beyond the limits of the corporation, and to buy or build gas-works or electric light plants for the purpose of lighting streets and public places, and supplying lights to the inhabitants of such cities and towns, with full authority to regulate and control the same. Sec. 2. Whenever the city council or board of trustees of any such city or town shall deem it advisable that the city or town of which they are such officers shall exercise the authority hereby conferred upon them in relation to either or both such water-works or system of sewerage or plant or works for lighting purposes, the corporation shall provide therefor by ordinance, which shall specify and adopt the system or plan proposed, and declare the estimated cost thereof as near as may be, and the same shall be submitted for ratification or rejection to the qualified voters of said city, at a special election, of which 30 days' notice shall be given in the paper doing the city printing, by publication in each issue of said paper during said time: provided that, if the said city or town is to become indebted or issue bonds for said water-works or sewerage system or plant or works for lighting purposes, the said proposition and authority to become so indebted shall be adopted and assented to by three-fifths of the qualified voters of said city or town voting at said election, otherwise by a majority vote; and, when so adopted and assented to as aforesaid, the said corporation shall become authorized to become indebted, and issue bonds as hereinafter provided; subject, however, to the condition that the total indebtedness shall not exceed ten per centum of the taxable property shown in the last assessment roll. Sec. 3. Whenever a city or town shall be authorized to issue bonds, the said bonds shall be issued in denominations of not less than one hundred or more than one thousand dollars, shall be numbered from one up, consecutively, shall bear the date of their issue, shall be payable not more than twenty years from date, and shall bear interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, with interest coupons attached, and the principal and interest shall be made payable at such place as may be designated. The bonds and each coupon shall be signed by the mayor, and attested by the clerk under the seal of the city or town. Sec. 4. There shall be levied each year a tax upon the taxable property of such city or town, as the case may be, sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds as the same accrues, and before seven years prior to the maturity thereof an annual sinking fund tax sufficient for the payment of said bonds at maturity, which taxes shall become due and collected as other taxes. Sec. 5. Said bonds shall be printed or engraved or lithographed on good bond paper, and a duly-authenticated copy of this act, together with the ordinance of the city or town authorizing and directing such special election, shall be printed on each bond, together with a statement signed by the mayor and clerk showing the result of said election. Sec. 6. Such bonds shall be sold in such manner as the corporate authorities shall deem for the best interest of the city or town. A register shall be kept of all bonds, which register shall show the number, date, amount, interest, name of payee, and when and where payable of each and every bond executed, issued or sold under the provisions of this act. Sec. 7. There being no law in this state authorizing cities and towns to construct internal improvements, and to issue bonds to pay therefor, an emergency exists. Therefore, this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its approval by the governor."

J. C. Halves and Chas. F. Fishback, for appellant. S. H. Piles, (Thomas R. Shepard, of counsel,) for appellees.

STILES, J. This was an amicable suit brought to obtain the court's construction of section 6, art. 8, of the constitution, and the legislation had thereunder, resulting in the act of February 26, 1890, (Sess. Laws, p. 225,) and the act of March 26, 1890, (Sess. Laws, p. 520,) as applied to the city of Seattle, which was proposing to issue certain bonds for a water and sewerage system, amounting to \$955,000. The controversy, however, was a real one, and under the pleadings fairly brought to this court two questions for answer, viz.: (1) Can a municipal corporation become indebted for water-works, sewers, and artificial light works in any sum greater than 5 per cent. of its last assessment roll? (2) To carry an election, where the question is that of increasing municipal indebtedness above  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the assessment roll, must the majority of three-fifths required be three-fifths of all the persons entitled to vote at the election or three-fifths of those who do vote thereat?

The circumstances which caused the presentation of the first question seem to have been a dispute as to whether, under the terms of the constitution and the acts referred to, the matter of providing water, sewers, and light for the inhabitants of a city is a "municipal purpose," or a "strictly municipal purpose." It is a fundamental principle in the law of municipal corporations that, although they are usually given a large discretion in the matter of raising and expending money, no money can be raised or expended for any but a "strictly municipal purpose," and that limitation is just as much laid upon the cities of this state with regard to the first  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of indebtedness as it is upon the additional  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., which must be authorized by a vote, although, in the latter case, the framers of the constitution saw fit to express the limitation. But, in our view, there is nothing in the constitution which forbids the idea that works of the character of these under discussion are those of a strictly municipal character, and therefore proper works for a municipality to undertake and maintain, either out of the current revenue or the first 5 per cent. of indebtedness. The limitation declared by the constitution is that whenever the indebtedness has reached 5 per cent. it must stop, unless more money is needed for water or light works or sewers. And in this connection we may say, in response to argument at the hearing, that we regard the language of the constitutional provision as reading in the disjunctive, as though it were "water, artificial light, or sewers." The city of Seattle was authorized by its charter (Acts 1886, pp. 240, 241, 244) to build, own, and operate such works, and to levy taxes therefor. It lacked only the power to incur indebtedness. This power it did not receive from the chapter of the constitution on municipal indebtedness, it is true; for that chapter contains no grant of power to these incorporations. It leaves them entirely to the legislature; but, deeming it certain that future legislatures would permit such indebtedness, it prescribed the limitations under which the power, when granted, must be exercised, and beyond which it must not go. The power was conferred upon the city of Seattle by the acts of the legislature referred to, we conceive, in very clear terms, though the appellant suggested a doubt on that point even. These two acts are entitled to be construed together, they having been passed at the same session; and we see no necessity to hold that the act of March 26th repealed that of February 26th. On the contrary, the latter act seems to form a fitting complement to sections 2 and 3 of its predecessor, elaborating the machinery by which they are to be operated, and leaving no room for hasty, careless, or underhand proceedings. By the last act the legislative body of the city must first express, by ordinance, the intention of the city to avail itself of its powers to inaugurate such works, specifying a distinct plan or system to be followed, with the estimated cost thereof; and the question of the adoption of the plan proposed must be submitted to the voters of the city. Clearly the intention was that, whereas such works are likely to demand large and unusual expenditures, the wisdom of which, in some cases, may be doubtful, the people, who would have to furnish the means, should be fully apprised of the whole scheme; and that there should be a definite, well-considered, and practicable scheme presented for their rejection or adoption. If no authority to incur indebtedness beyond the current revenue is asked for, the proposition may be carried by a majority vote; but if it is intended that the city shall incur a debt for these costly works, the majority to carry the proposition must be three-fifths, and the indebtedness must be created by the issuance of bonds, to run not exceeding 20 years, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. The three-fifths majority having been obtained, there is no further obstacle to the issuance of such bonds, although they amount to more than 5 per cent. of the taxable property of the city, providing with their issuance the total indebtedness of the city is not increased to more than 10 per cent. of such property.

In response to the second question we have not the least hesitation in answering that the three-fifths majority required to carry an election in favor of increasing municipal indebtedness is three-fifths of those persons who actually vote at the election, and not three-fifths of all those who may have the right to vote thereat. The language of the constitution is that no municipal corporation shall become indebted beyond  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of its taxable property "without the assent of three-fifths of the voters therein voting at an election to be held for that purpose." How could words be plainer? It is three-fifths of the voters voting, not of all persons who might vote, but may or may not do so. The word "therein," placed between "voters" and "voting," merely qualifies the persons who might vote, not the body of voters who must vote to constitute a lawful majority. At certain elections many persons residing outside of a city have their voting places assigned within the city limits; but at these particular elections it is only the voters "therein"—residing therein—who can vote. Perhaps a longer phrase might have served to remove all doubt from every mind, but to us the interpretation seems clear as it is. In every other instance, we believe, where the constitution prescribes the majority required to carry a particular proposition submitted to the electors, it is a majority of those who vote upon that proposition. See article 8, § 3, authorizing the state to contract debts; article 11, § 2, of the removal of county seats; article 11, § 10, of the adoption of charters by cities; article 14, §§ 1, 2, of the location of the seat of government; article 23, § 1, of amendments to the constitution; and section 2, of the calling of constitutional conventions. Against this it may be said that in each of the instances mentioned the majority required is only a majority of those voting on the question submitted; but when we observe that in all these cases the questions are to be submitted at general elections, where the whole number of votes cast may far exceed those cast for and against the particular proposition, the general policy of the constitution becomes clear in no case to require an absolute majority of all those who vote at a general election to carry a special proposition, but only a majority of those who see fit to express themselves upon the proposition. And, this policy being so, why, in this case of municipal indebtedness, should we, without any special or apparent reason, argue plain words out of their ordinary meaning, and conclude that a departure was intended from the otherwise steady policy of the constitution, simply because precisely the same form of words is not used? These elections are hedged about with all the precautions to secure fairness and a full vote that general elections have. Being purely special elections, they are free from the political influences and the vice of trading which often unjustly sway and control the vote on such matters at general elections. Every elector has full constructive notice, and it would be strange indeed if he did not have actual notice of the pending question; and he cannot complain if the result, without his vote, is not according to his desire.

This question of majorities has been discussed by several of our courts of last resort in cases similar to this. In North Carolina, (Southerland v. Goldsboro, 96 N. C. 49, 1 S. E. Rep. 760, and Duke v. Brown, 96 N. C. 127, 1 S. E. Rep. 873,) in Georgia, (Bell v. Americus, 3 S. E. Rep. 612,) and in Mississippi, (Hawkins v. Carroll Co., 50 Miss. 755,) the supreme courts of those states held that no less than a majority of all the persons qualified to vote was sufficient to carry the several propositions submitted. But in Carroll Co. v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, the supreme court of the United States reviewed the case of Hawkins v. Carroll Co., and dissented from and overruled it. The constitution of Mississippi contained a provision that the legislature should authorize no county to aid any railroad company "unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, * * * at a special election or regular election to be held therein, shall assent thereto;" and this language the court, in Carroll Co. v. Smith, held to mean two-thirds of the qualified voters present and voting at the election in favor of the proposition, as determined by the official return of the result, saying: "In that connection a voter is one who votes; not one who, although qualified to vote, does not vote." This decision of the supreme court but followed its earlier decisions in similar cases, viz.: St. Joseph Tp. v. Rogers, 16 Wall. 644, and County of Cass v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360. In the last-named case the constitution of Missouri prohibited townships from aiding railroad companies "unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of the * * * town, at a regular or special election to be held therein, shall assent thereto," which is identically the same language, slightly transposed, as that of the Mississippi constitution, above quoted. But what was known as the "Township Aid Act" of Missouri, approved March 23, 1868, authorized townships to subscribe to the capital stock of railroad companies "whenever two-thirds of the qualified voters of the township voting at an election called for that purpose shall vote in favor of the subscription;" and it will be noted that the language of this township aid act—"voters of the township voting"—is precisely the same as that of our constitution—"voters therein voting." In that case the parties and the court agreed in construing the meaning of the legislative provision to be what we hold it to be here,—that the majority meant was a majority of those who voted; but the defendant in error contended that the constitutional provision required a majority of all the qualified voters of the township, but not successfully, for the court construed the constitution and the act to mean the same thing, and said that any other construction would be productive of the greatest inconvenience, and ought not to be adopted, unless the legislative will to that effect was clearly expressed. In McCrary, Elect. (3d Ed.) § 173, the general rule is laid down thus: "Where a statute requires a question to be decided * * * by the votes of the majority of the voters of a county, this does not require that a majority of all persons in the county entitled to vote shall actually vote affirmatively, but only that the result shall be decided by a majority of the voters."

The plaintiff, by two insufficient paragraphs of his complaint, attempted to set forth a second cause of action, alleging that the city of Seattle was indebted in about the sum of $400,000, which was $159,746.50 in excess of the indebtedness allowed to be incurred by law, and which excess was contracted since the act of February 26, 1890, validating certain municipal indebtedness, without the assent of three-fifths of the voters of the city. And he further alleged that the city was attempting to fund the said excess without a vote, and that it would do so unless restrained. His application for an injunction upon this statement of facts was refused, and, we think, rightly. The complaint was too vague, containing, as it did, no statement of any fact on the part of the city's representatives threatening the alleged funding. At the hearing in this court the parties, by agreement, sought to amend the pleading, and obtain a construction of the statute above mentioned; but we must decline to permit the amendment, as, in our view, it does not come within the rules which allow amendments in this court. We have looked into the proposed pleading, however, and find it open to the same objection as its original, viz., that it shows no acts going to constitute an invasion of the limits set up by the funding act, or a threat to invade the same. In short, it discloses no real controversy, such as appears in the first cause of action. The things feared may be done or attempted, and they may never be. When some step in their direction is taken it will be time enough to appeal to the courts. Upon all grounds, therefore, the action of the court below in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint should be sustained, and its judgment affirmed, and it is so ordered; costs to the appellee.

D. P. Ballard and J. W. Metcalf, for appellant. A. L. Miller, for appellees.

STILES, J. The matter at issue in this case was the same as that in Metcalf v. City of Seattle, ante, 1010, (decided at this special session of the court,) there being but one question to be passed upon, however, viz., that whether the majority required to authorize the officials of a county to issue bonds to build a court-house must be three-fifths of all the voters of the county, or three-fifths of those voting. The action of the court below was the same as that of the superior court of King county, and the judgment here must be the same as in Metcalf v. City of Seattle, for the reasons fully given in that case. Judgment affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—WATER AND SEWERAGE SYSTEMS—BONDS.

1. The charter of the city of Seattle, § 12, (Acts Wash. 1886, p. 244,) which requires a proposition for the erection of water-works to be submitted to the voters of the city "at a general election," does not apply to water-works constructed under the authority of Acts Wash. Feb. 26, 1890, and March 26, 1890, which empower cities generally to construct and maintain water, light, and sewerage systems, with the proceeds of long-time bonds, to be issued with the assent of three-fifths of the voters voting at "a special election;" and hence the proposition for such a system need not be submitted at a general election.

2. Though water-works, sewers, and light plants are not commonly spoken of as "internal improvements," yet Act Wash. March 26, 1890, entitled "An act authorizing cities and towns to construct internal improvements," under which the legislature empowers cities to construct water, light, and sewerage systems, does not violate Const. Wash. art. 2, § 19, which requires the subject of an act to be expressed in its title.

3. Act Wash. March 26, 1890, which authorizes the council of a city, by ordinance, to submit to the voters a plan for the construction of water, light, and sewerage systems, "either or both," clearly authorizes an ordinance on these subjects to be either single, double, or triple; and hence it suspends the restriction imposed by the city charter of Seattle, § 78, that "no ordinance shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

4. The record of an ordinance was made by the city clerk from a correctly printed copy, the original having been lost. Subsequently the city attorney undertook to prepare a substitute for the original, but by mistake he worded it differently in some particulars. This substituted copy was signed by the mayor and clerk, and placed on file in the latter's office. Afterwards an assistant clerk, without authority from any one, erased and interlined the recorded ordinance to make it conform to the substituted copy. Held, that showing these facts was not the impeachment of a record, and that the ordinance, as originally recorded by the clerk, before the erasures and interlineations were made, was the true ordinance.

5. Under an ordinance authorizing the construction of a water and sewerage system, "if three-fifths of the voters of said city shall at said election vote" in its favor, a three-fifths majority of those actually voting on the proposition is all that is necessary, and not three-fifths of the persons who may be entitled to a vote.

6. Act Wash. March 26, 1890, provides that before a proposition for the construction of water, light, or sewerage systems shall be submitted to the votes of the electors, the plan of operation shall be adopted, and the probable cost estimated, and certified to by the council in the form of an ordinance. Held, that the city council can lawfully submit to vote only those matters directed to be submitted by the legislature, and that the rate of interest that the bonds shall bear, their sale at par, and the place of payment, need not be submitted to the electors.

7. The fact that the ordinance submitted to the voters fixed the rate of interest for the bonds, and their place of payment, and provided for their sale at par, does not form an unchangeable rule under which the council must negotiate the bonds; and the actual negotiation of the bonds at a higher rate of interest than provided for in the ordinance will not be restrained at the suit of a tax-payer, where the mayor and council have acted in good faith, and have been unable to negotiate them at the rate originally fixed.

8. Where the bonds were not negotiated until some months after the day of their date, an agreement under which the purchaser is entitled to interest for the entire term for which they have to run is not a violation of Act Wash. March 29, 1890, which requires the bonds to "bear the date of their issue."

9. Act Wash. March 26, 1890, which requires such bonds to be signed by the mayor of the city, is sufficiently complied with by the signature of the bonds by the person occupying the office at the date of their negotiation and delivery, though he was elected after the day of their date.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

Action by H. L. Yesler and others against the city of Seattle and others to enjoin the negotiation of the city's bonds. From a judgment for the defendant, complainant appeals. For the statutes involved in this case, see Metcalf v. City of Seattle, ante, 1010.

STILES, J. In this appeal the matter of the issuance of the same bonds which were the subject-matter of the recent case of Metcalf v. City of Seattle, ante, 1010, was again in controversy, the appellants seeking to enjoin the sale of the bonds to purchasers approved by the city council of the city of Seattle, upon the several grounds which will be stated and discussed in order.

1. Appellants maintain that inasmuch as section 12 of the act incorporating the city of Seattle (Acts 1886, p. 244) grants power to that city to erect and maintain water-works, provided that no such works should be erected "until a majority of the voters of the city, at a general election of the city, shall vote upon the same," the special election of June 4, 1890, was an invalid election; their contention being that since the act of February 26, 1890, contains no authority to erect water-works, and the act of March 26, 1890, has no clause repealing conflicting laws, this requirement of submission at a general election still stands as the law of that corporation. But even were we to hold that there had not been a repeal of the quoted part of section 12 of the act of 1886, by reason of the rule that special acts of this class are not to be taken as repealed by general acts unless the intent to repeal is plainly apparent, it is equally apparent that the act of 1886 did not provide for the erection of water-works and the construction of sewers with the proceeds of long-time bonds, which the acts of February 26 and March 26, 1890, do. Thus a new and distinct power is conferred by a method, the main and most beneficial feature of which is the relief of the present generation of tax-payers from excessive assessments to pay cash for such public improvements; and whenever that feature is sought to be availed of, as it was in this instance, all the safeguards accompanying it must be adopted. One of these is the special election, and there was therefore no error in the proceedings on that score.

2. It is objected that the act of March 26th is invalid, because the subject is not expressed in the title. Const. art. 2, § 19. The title is "An act authorizing cities and towns to construct internal improvements, and to issue bonds therefor, and declaring an emergency," and the criticism is that although there is a subject expressed, it is not the subject treated of in the body of the act, since water-works, sewers, and artificial light plants are not "internal improvements" within the ordinary meaning of the phrase. Perhaps this is an original use of the term "internal improvements." It has certainly not been commonly applied to the improvements supposed to be made by cities for the benefit of their inhabitants, but has been employed more grandiloquently in reference to the improvement of highways and channels of travel and commerce in the statutes of congress and the state legislatures. And yet when under it our legislature particularizes water-works, sewers, and light plants, which certainly are in fact internal improvements, relatively to the cities of the state, we do not deem the verbal criticism of sufficient weight to set aside the act. The cases cited (Railway Co. v. Colfax Co., 4 Neb. 450, and Dawson Co. v. McNamar, 10 Neb. 276, 4 N. W. Rep. 991) are not in point, since these were instances of the issuance of bonds for purposes not particularized in the statute, which was a general one authorizing counties to issue bonds in aid of railroad and other internal improvements.

3. The act of 1886, § 78, contains the usual restriction that "no ordinance shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title;" wherefore it is asserted that ordinance No. 1343 was void, because both in its title and in the subject treated of it was double, in that it provided for both water-works and sewers; and, in so far as the double subject is concerned, our judgment is with the appellants, for both in the constitution and the statute water-works and sewers are distinct things; and it would probably be better that in all cases propositions for either of these improvements, as well as for lighting systems, should be submitted either at separate elections, or separately at the same election, so that the voters might be free to adopt one system without being forced thereby to adopt the other, or to reject one without losing the other. But the restrictive clause of section 78 of the act of 1886 has no effect upon that portion of the act of March 26, 1890, which provides for submitting propositions to the voters of cities, since the latter act, by its own terms, contained in section 2, suspends the restriction. Section 2 says: "Whenever the city council or board of trustees of any such city or town shall deem it advisable that the city or town, of which they are such officers, shall exercise the authority hereby conferred upon them in relation to either or both such water-works or system of sewerage or plant or works for lighting purposes, the corporation shall provide therefor by ordinance," etc. This is a general law applicable to all incorporated cities and towns, and is to be executed in the same manner wherever it is made use of. It has become a part of the charter of each city and town, and on this subject clearly authorizes ordinances to be either single, double, or triple.

4. The next proposition in the case embraces questions of mixed law and fact. The complaint alleged that the ordinance had never been published as required by section 79 of the charter, (Act 1886;) but it was admitted at the hearing that a publication had been made, excepting that, whereas section 6 of the ordinance adopted by the council and approved by the mayor, as appeared from the clerk's official record, had provided that the proposed works should be entered upon "if three-fifths of the qualified voters of said city of Seattle voting at said election vote in favor of authorizing" the same, on the other hand the attempted publication had represented section 6 as conditioned that "if three-fifths of the voters of said city of Seattle shall, at said election, vote in favor of authorizing" the same. The answer alleged, and the court below, over appellant's objection, permitted the appellee to show, that the ordinance was passed and approved in the words of section 6, as admitted to have been published, but that through haste in procuring publication the city clerk had permitted the printer to take the original sheets of the ordinance to be used as copy for the newspaper type-setters before the ordinance had been copied into the record book; that the printer had separated the sheets, perhaps cut them up, and ultimately lost them; that the clerk had preserved one of the newspaper copies, as officially published, and from that made his copy in the ordinance record book; that some time after this, through the frequency of calls for the original ordinance by third persons, the attention of the mayor and city attorney was drawn to the fact that it had been lost, and the city attorney undertook to make a substitute original copy, which was to be signed by the mayor and clerk, dated and filed as of the date of the original, and to be, to all appearances, the original itself; that the city attorney mistook a prepared draft for an ordinance which he had in his office for a verbatim copy of the one adopted, and prepared his substituted copy from that, instead of from a printed copy; that this substitute, containing the variations noted, was signed by the mayor and clerk, and dated and filed as proposed, and was for some time treated as the true original; and that an assistant in the office of the clerk, after the substitute copy had been deposited in the files of the clerk's office, noticed the discrepancy between it and the recorded ordinance, and without authority or instruction from any one interlined in the record the word "qualified," and erased the word "shall," and interlined the word "voting" in its place. The appellants' objection to proof of these facts was on the ground that the record of the ordinance could not be collaterally impeached. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 297-299. But we hold that this was not a case of the impeachment of a record, but merely to determine what was the record. The substitute copy made by the city attorney was certainly not a record; and no more were the interlineations and the erasure made by the unauthorized assistant clerk a part of a record. The testimony went to show these facts, and to establish what was the true record, viz., the ordinance as copied into the record book, by the clerk, from the printed copy, before the erasure and interlineations were made; and this, in our judgment, was entirely competent.

This leaves the ordinance reading: "If three-fifths of the voters of said city of Seattle shall at said election vote in favor of authorizing," etc., which it will be observed is not the language of it as presented in Metcalf v. City of Seattle, ante, 1010. Appellants therefore confidently claim that since it is admitted that there were over 4,000 persons in Seattle entitled to vote on the 4th day of June, 1890, and less than 800 did in fact vote, the authority to bond the city for water-works and sewers was not granted. But under our construction of the word "voter" in Metcalf v. City of Seattle and the authorities there cited, we see no difference whatever in meaning between "if three-fifths of the voters shall vote" and "if three-fifths of the qualified voters voting vote." The word "qualified" adds nothing. Every voter is a "qualified" voter; and if a voter is one who votes, then, at an election, he is a "voter voting." It was competent for the city of Seattle to be more particular than the statute, and provide that, before the proposition for public water-works and sewers pass, it should be authorized by the affirmative vote of a majority of all the persons entitled to vote; but unless it has done so in clear and indisputable language it should be taken to have accepted the act of March 26th as the legislature enacted it; and, in view of the eagerness with which the legislative body of the city have pursued the matter, we deem it not likely that it would seek to make the way to the issuance of these bonds more difficult than was necessary under the law.

5. The ordinance, in addition to the systems of water-works and sewers set forth, declared the probable cost, and proposed the issue of bonds for $955,000. This was required by section 2 of the act of March 26th. But the ordinance went much further, and enacted many other things not necessary to it as a complete ordinance for submission. The place of payment was fixed at the office of the city treasurer, the rate of interest was made 5 per cent., and it was ordered that the bonds be disposed of at not less than par. Now it is contended by appellants that every feature of the ordinance, by its submission to the voters, became a condition precedent to the lawful issue of the bonds under the authority conferred by the result of the election. Were this point held good, it will be seen that the whole scheme would be very effectually blocked, for the present at least. It appears that in accordance with the authority contained in the ordinance the mayor and the finance committee of the council, as soon as the election of June 4th had ratified the action of the council, prepared to have the bonds lithographed, and advertised them for sale as bonds of date July 1, 1890, running 20 years, at 5 per cent., interest on the first coupon from July 1st to delivery to be deducted. The time set for receiving bids was July 8, 1890; but neither at that time nor at any subsequent date could any person be found to take the bonds on the terms offered, the rate of interest being lower than the market commanded for that class of securities. On the 19th of August, however, one N. W. Halsey, who was in the employ of the firm of N. W. Harris & Co., offered on behalf of Harris & Co. to purchase the whole issue of bonds, providing that terms could be made so that, in effect, the rate of interest could be raised to about 5% per cent. The experience of the mayor and finance committee had convinced them and the council that a 5 per cent. bond could not be negotiated at par, and they were willing to accept the offer of Harris & Co. But both parties to the transaction were fearful that the provisions of the ordinance were binding upon all action taken in furtherance of the issue of these bonds, and they therefore resorted to a series of clumsy fictions to avoid the effect of the requirements as to rate of interest and selling at par, the excuse on the part of the city officials being the pressing need of the people for a larger supply of water and better sewerage, the delay and expense of another election, and the fact that the credit of the city had already been pledged to a large amount for water machinery on the faith that the proceeds of these bonds would be immediately available. Harris & Co. offered to take the entire issue of $955,000, paying $350,000 cash, $50,000 October 1st, $50,000 November 1st, and $505,000 after January 1, 1891, in installments of not less than $10,000, nor more than $50,000, as the funds should be actually needed by the city in paying for water and sewerage work on estimates to be furnished by the engineers in charge, with 15 days' notice of a call for each installment; all interest coupons from the date of the bonds, July 1, 1890, to remain attached to the bonds uncanceled. They further required that a commission of 2 per cent. of $955,000 be forthwith paid to Halsey in a warrant on the general fund of the city, and that a warrant of the city of Seattle for $19,000 be accepted as part of the first payment of $350,000, to be made by them. The place of payment was to be changed to some national bank in the city of New York. We agree with the appellants that all of this maneuvering was simply a scheme to give the bonds to Harris & Co. at a discount, and the appellees substantially concedes such to be the fact. In the first place, the commission to Halsey, who was the authorized agent of Harris & Co., was a rebate to the purchasers of $19,000 from the face of the first $350,000; and, secondly, the retention of all coupons was an advance payment of interest to the extent of some $43,000 for a period during which Harris & Co. would still retain the purchase money, and have the full use of it; so that the effect would be that the city of Seattle, in 20 years, would pay about $62,000 more for the use of the money than it would had the bonds been sold in strict accord with the terms of the ordinance. This, doubtless, was the moving cause of the appellants' suit, and is the most strongly urged of all their grounds of complaint. The council, by ordinance, to the formality of which no objection is raised, accepted the proposition of Harris & Co., caused a warrant for $19,000 to be drawn on the general fund in favor of Halsey, (which was immediately indorsed to Harris & Co., and by them, through Halsey, turned in on their first payment,) and were proceeding to the execution of the bonds when this action delayed all further steps. Unless we hold that this change of plan by the council was not expressly or impliedly forbidden by the law governing their action, the injunction asked should be granted. We observe, at the outset of this part of the case, that no fraud whatever is alleged against the council, or any of its members; nor was there any attempt to avoid the effect of any part of the statute, unless it be what is claimed to be its unwritten part, binding the council to every provision of ordinance No. 1343. Municipal corporations are almost invariably invested with the power to borrow money. Very eminent jurists have maintained that this power was inherent with the idea of a corporation, and needed not to be granted specially. But the rule is settled otherwise, and now, aside from constitutional and statutory limitations, courts demand some charter provisions on this subject before they will recognize indebtedness of this kind. The power to become indebted being made apparent, however, courts are liberal in their construction of statutes and constitutional provisions couched in general language, so long as the purposes for which indebtedness is created are clearly seen to be municipal in their character. The standard for a county is, however, measured by the objects of its incorporation, that of a school-district by an entirely different set of objects, and that of a city or town by the peculiar and infinitely varied needs of their inhabitants, circumscribed by reasonable bounds. Usually the wisdom of incurring debt by these corporations is delegated to the legislative authority of each, though there have been exceptions in which corporations have been required by the legislature to issue bonds for purposes foreign to their organization, and there is a numerous class of instances in which it is common to submit propositions to the electors of the corporation, and thus delegate to the body of the people the power to say whether a debt shall be incurred or not. This latter class, however, is generally limited to cases where the object to be promoted is not within the purview of legitimate corporate purposes, though it is of a quasi public nature. Our constitution, in the most positive terms, has cut off from every municipal corporation every subject of expense and indebtedness excepting those which are within the legitimate intentment of its organization; and so far as cities are concerned, it has gone to the extreme of restriction by fixing the 1% per cent. limit, beyond which the legislative bodies of those corporations cannot incur valid indebtedness without the assent of their constituents. The act of February 28, 1890, undertakes to confer upon existing cities the power to become indebted up to the limit prescribed by section 6, art. 8, of the constitution; and upon examination we find that until the 5 per cent. limit is reached the council have delegated to them the whole matter of how, and for how long, and at what rate of interest, loans shall be negotiated, and all of the details; and this is with reason, since these are business corporations, acting, as a general rule, only through their legislative head, and it is not practicable to submit details to the body of voting inhabitants. True, when 1½ per cent. has been reached, the people must be consulted as to further borrowing of money or contracting indebtedness, but the method and other details are entirely left to the council, unless water-works, sewers, or light plants are contemplated, when the act of March 26th makes some modifications. Now the power is thus delegated to the municipal legislature, with the assent given, to proceed and "borrow money" or "contract indebtedness," it being the sole judge of the proper method, whether by bonds or warrants or open account, confidence being reposed in the wisdom and honor of its members that they will act for the best interest of the community. No citizen or tax-payer can question, in the courts, the uncorrupted action of his city council in these particulars, as no stockholder can dispute the doings of the board of directors of a private corporation of which he holds stock, in the absence of fraud. Nor does the law permit the council of a city to delegate to the popular vote the determination of any matter before it unless the right to so delegate it has been expressly conferred or enjoined by statute. Ministerial agents, with certain limited discretion, it may appoint, but that is all. Now, turning to the act of March 26th, we find that the legislature saw fit to enlarge somewhat on the requirement that the assent of voters should be secured to the proposition to borrow money or become indebted for water-works, sewers, or light plants, and prescribed that before the vote should be taken the plan of operation should be adopted and the probable cost estimated and certified to by the council in the form of an ordinance. Here is a mandatory delegation to the popular voice by the legislature itself. It is not in the discretion of the council to submit the question to vote or not. The council is merely the medium by which the wish of the people in the matter is recorded. Therefore we conclude that the council could lawfully submit to vote only those matters directed to be submitted by its superior authority, the legislature.

Appellants urge that, to be consistent with our decision in Metcalf v. City of Seattle, we must hold with them, since, in that case, we said, in reference to the act of March 26th: "The intention of the act was that the people who would have to furnish the means should be fully apprised of the whole scheme, and that there should be a definite, well-considered, and practicable scheme presented for their rejection or adoption;" they maintaining that the "scheme" submitted was to borrow $955,000 net, running at 5 per cent. interest. But in using the word "scheme" in the former opinion we had no reference to any matter connected with the bonds themselves. Nothing of the kind was involved in the case, and our use of the term was as a synonym for the phrase "system or plan" employed in section 2 of the act, and related wholly to the physical features of the proposition, not to the financial means of accomplishing them. Touching that point, the people have a guaranty in the further provisions of the statute that bonds must be payable in not more than 20 years, and bear interest not exceeding 6 per cent.

It follows that we hold the rate per cent., the sale at par, and the place of payment not to have been necessary to the ordinance, but the question remains whether, having been placed there, they must remain as the unchangeable rule of the council's action. We are cited to a number of cases which are presented as sustaining the affirmative. State v. Delafield, 8 Paige, 527, held that a sale of bonds, nominally at par, but allowing accrued interest to the purchaser, was not really a sale at par where the statute expressly required the par value to be realized. We have held that the plan here proposed would not be a sale at par. Cowdrey v. Canadea, 16 Fed. Rep. 532, fairly represents the other cases cited, all of which, without exception, are cases growing out of the issue of municipal bonds in aid of railroad or other quasi-public corporations; and the judge in that case clearly states the ground of difference in the treatment of bonds of that class and those issued for purely municipal purposes. He says: "The authority of a majority of the tax-payers of a town to incumber the property of a minority against their will in aid of a railroad or other corporation receives no countenance from the principles of the common law. Every step, therefore, required by the statute must be in strict conformity therewith." In Lawson v. Schnellen, 33 Wis. 288, the statute required the written proposition of the railroad company to be submitted to vote of the people, and the court held that if the proposition was assented to it became a contract, which could not be altered by county commissioners. Douglas Co. v. Waldrige, 38 Wis. 179, was of the same character. Jackson Co. v. Brush, 77 Ill. 59, held that railroad aid bonds should not be delivered until the conditions precedent, which had been made a part of the contract between the county and the company, had been fully complied with. The remarks of High on Injunctions, (volume 2, p. 1289,) and of Dillon on Municipal Corporations, (section 91,) and Dillon on Municipal Bonds, (section 6 et seq.,) are all directed to this class of corporation aid bonds, the latter volume being entirely devoted to them; and the gist of these cases and authorities, so far as they have any bearing here, is that if a railroad or other company is aided by such bonds, the propositions submitted to the vote of the people, whether originating in the statute, or with the municipal agents, or from the corporation, became a part of the contract between the two corporations, and follow the bonds as the law of their issuance.

But here we have no element of contract whatever, and the authority of a majority of the voters to incur the property of the minority, even against their will, in furtherance of municipal objects and improvements, receives the broadest countenance from the principles of the common law. There is no reason which commends itself to our judgment for holding that those parts of ordinance 1343, referring to the details of the negotiation, should be inviolate, and not subject to amendment in the manner adopted, when it was found that no one would take 5 per cent. bonds at par. We still have to consider the alleged post-dating of the bonds; but, aside from that, it is conceded that the motive of those engaged in the transaction were fair, and the actual result to the city of Seattle was a rate of interest higher by about one-third of 1 per cent. per annum, and two-thirds of 1 per cent. less than the rate recognized by the statute. It would certainly have been far better had the council, seeing their dilemma, met the fact that 5 per cent. bonds could not be marketed at par, with a new ordinance authorizing their negotiation at the best rate obtainable under 6 per cent. They would have been subjected to far less criticism, and the record here would have been much less involved.

6. The statute requires that such bonds shall "bear the date of their issue," and it has become a question in this case what the date of issue is, since the bonds were prepared with the date July 1, 1890, and the contract with Harris & Co. requires that the coupons remain intact from that date, although none of the bonds have been delivered, and some of them will not be delivered for many months. In financial parlance the term "issue" seems to have two phases of meaning. "Date of issue," when applied to notes, bonds, etc., of a series, usually means the arbitrary date fixed as the beginning of the term for which they run, without reference to the precise time when convenience or the state of the market may permit of their sale or delivery, and we see no reason why the act of March 26, 1890, should not have that interpretation. When the bonds are delivered to the purchaser, they will be "issued" to him, which is the other meaning of the term. Usually the question of interest from the date of issue to the time of sale of bonds is adjusted by payment of the face and interest by the purchaser, or the removal of coupons. But here the contract stipulates that the coupons shall remain uncanceled. It was a fair contract, and there can be no wrong done if the term of some of the bonds, in the hands of purchasers, is something less than 20 years. No officer has sought to evade any statute affecting these bonds which came into operation since the date of issue, as was the case in Anthony v. County of Jasper, 101 U. S. 693; nor did a person not an officer of the corporation at the time of signing affix his name to the bonds, as an officer, to avoid the refusal of the acting officer to sign, as occurred in Coler v. Cleburne, 131 U. S. 162, 9 Sup. Ct.

Rep. 720. Under the circumstances the date July 1st was not an unreasonable date, and complied with the law in that respect.

7. The act of March 26th, among other formalities, required the bonds to be signed by the mayor of the city; but, pending the disposal of bonds, a municipal election was held July 14th, at which Harry White was elected mayor. As he was not the mayor July 1st, appellants maintain that he cannot consistently sign them under that date of issue. But if the bonds are valid, although not executed and delivered at the precise date of issue, it follows that the officer in office when the occasion arrived for executing them would be the proper party to affix the official signature of the mayor. In Weyauwega v. Ayling, 99 U. S. 112, the bonds of a town bore date June 1st, and were signed by the chairman of the board of supervisors, and by the town-clerk; but the person signing as clerk did not sign until July 13th, at which date he had ceased to be the town-clerk. Still the supreme court held the bonds good, presuming that the bonds were delivered with the assent of the then clerk, certainly a far more extreme case than that under consideration. Coler v. Cleburne, 131 U. S. 162, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720, seems to be, in some of its features, at least, on all fours with this case. The city of Cleburne, Tex., in September, 1883, contracted to pay city bonds for the erection of water-works, the bonds to bear date January 1, 1884. The works were not ready for acceptance until July 3, 1884, when the person who had been the mayor on January 1st had gone out of office, and his successor was acting. The statute of Texas required such bonds to be signed by the mayor; but the city council argued that the mayor, at the date of the bonds, should sign them, even though he had gone out of office, and they passed a resolution requesting him to sign them, with which he complied. An innocent holder had brought suit upon unpaid coupons of these bonds; but the supreme court held, without dissent, that no person but the mayor of the city could lawfully sign the bonds, although thus formally requested to do so by the council, and that they were therefore void. The court, however, nowhere hints that because the term of the mayor in office January 1st had expired in April no bonds bearing date January 1st could be issued by the city of Cleburne; and we have found no authority sustaining such a proposition. Upon all this branch of the case we can frame no better reason for our judgment for the appellee than is contained in section 6 of the act of March 26th, in the words: "Such bonds shall be sold in such manner as the corporate authorities shall deem for the best interest of the city or town." The judgment of the superior court is affirmed, with costs to appellee.

WARD v. TOWN OF FOREST GROVE.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—LIABILITIES—RATIFICATION OF CONTRACTS.

A municipal corporation, unless prohibited by its charter, is liable for the professional services of a physician in attending persons afflicted with small-pox, within its limits, employed by a committee assuming to act for it, when such services have been rendered with knowledge of its officers, and without notice that the contract of employment is not recognized as valid and binding, although the corporation has not conferred the authority in a formal manner on such committee to make the contract.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

This is an action to recover from the defendant compensation for services as a physician, rendered by plaintiff at the request of defendant, in caring for persons afflicted with small-pox within the town. Section 32 of the act incorporating defendant, among other things, empowers the trustees "to make regulations to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into the town; to remove persons afflicted with such diseases therefrom to suitable hospitals provided by the town for that purpose; to secure the protection of persons and property therein, and to provide for the health, cleanliness, ornament, peace, and good order of the town." Section 33 provides that "the power and authority given to the board of trustees by section 32 can be exercised or enforced only by ordinance, unless otherwise expressly provided." Laws 1885, p. 427. At the trial plaintiff offered to prove, and offered evidence tending to show, that at the time alleged in the complaint residents and inhabitants of the town of Forest Grove, then within its limits, were afflicted with small-pox; that such people were poor, and unable to procure necessary care or medical attention. These facts came to the knowledge of the board of trustees, who thereupon met and adopted a resolution appointing a committee and authorizing it to procure necessary medical and other assistance for the persons thus afflicted, and to make all necessary regulations to prevent the spread of the disease. The resolution was duly recorded, and the proper record thereof offered in evidence. The plaintiff then offered to show that at the request of such committee he attended the small-pox patients as a physician, and co-operated with them to prevent the spread of the disease; that such committee took charge of the house containing those afflicted, kept guards around to prevent any one going to or from the house except such persons as they permitted; ordered food for the inmates, and established quarantine regulations; that the reasonable value of the services rendered by plaintiff is $500, and were performed on the credit of the defendant, and at its request, and have not been paid. To the introduction of all this testimony defendant by its counsel objected, because the authority of the committee employing plaintiff had not been conferred by ordinance, as provided in section 33 of the act incorporating defendant. The court sustained this objection, excluded the evidence, and directed a nonsuit, to which ruling plaintiff duly excepted.

Thos. H. Tongue, for appellant. Stott, Boise & Stott, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The contention of respondent is that, while the defendant, through its agents, had the right and power to employ plaintiff, yet, even if it did employ him, and upon the faith of said employment plaintiff rendered valuable services for the benefit of defendant, it had not conferred the authority upon its agents in a sufficiently formal manner, and therefore is not bound to compensate plaintiff for his services. The argument is that section 32 of the defendant's charter provides the mode and manner of exercising the right "to make regulations to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into the town," etc., and until an ordinance for that purpose has been duly passed the town can incur no liability in respect thereto, although the services may have been rendered at the request and with the full knowledge of the town authorities. There would be much force in such an argument if the contract was executory, but here the contract has been fully executed. The defendant attempted to exercise the power given it by a formal resolution of its board of trustees authorizing a committee to provide the necessary care and attention for its small-pox patients. The plaintiff rendered the services at the request of such committee, and with the full knowledge and consent of the town authorities; and the defendant, having received the benefit of his services, should compensate him therefor. As was said by FIELD, J., in Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 469: "The obligation to do justice rests equally upon it as upon an individual. It cannot avail itself of the property or labor of a party, and screen itself from responsibility, under the plea that it never passed an ordinance on the subject. As against individuals, the law implies a promise to pay in such cases, and the implication extends equally against corporations. This is as well settled by the authorities as any principle of law can be." So, in Fisher v. La Rue, 15 Barb. 323: "It is well settled, at least in this country, that when a person is employed for a corporation by one assuming to act in its behalf, and goes on, renders the services according to the agreement, with the knowledge of its officers, and without notice that the contract is not recognized as valid and binding, such corporation will be held to have sanctioned and ratified the contract, and be compelled to pay for the services according to the agreement. Having availed itself of the services and received the benefits, it is bound in conscience to pay, and will not be heard to say that the original agreement was made by a person not legally authorized to contract." To the same effect, see Tyler v. Trustees, 14 Or. 485, 13 Pac. Rep. 329; Beers v. Dalles City, 16 Or. 334, 18 Pac. Rep. 835; Pixley v. Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 183; Cincinnati v. Cameron, 33 Ohio St. 336. Plaintiff having rendered services as a physician in the care of small-pox patients by the request of the authorities of defendant, and with their full knowledge and consent, it hardly comports with fair dealing that it should seek to exonerate itself from liability from a debt on this account, contracted, as it was, by and through its accredited agents, and with its affirmative acquiescence, because the forms prescribed by its charter have not been pursued, and the law will fail to effect its true end if the defense can prevail. This is not a case where the officers of the corporation have exceeded their authority; nor is it a case where the mode of contracting is specially prescribed and limited by the charter. Here the power to make all needful rules and regulations for the care of and attention to persons within the corporate limits afflicted with small-pox or other contagious diseases, which necessarily include contracts for medical attendance, is fully and plainly conferred; and, although a particular form is prescribed which shall be the evidence of the exercise of such power, the absence of this evidence does not destroy the power. Cincinnati v. Cameron, 33 Ohio St. 365. The corporation had the power to make the contract with plaintiff upon which this suit is brought, and attempted to exercise such power by a formal resolution of its board of trustees. This resolution was, perhaps, an irregular exercise of the power, but it accomplished the purpose intended; and, having received the benefit of plaintiff's services, the defendant should be compelled to pay him the reasonable value thereof. Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

D. M. OSBORNE & CO. v. HUBBARD.(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 12, 1891.)PROMISSORY NOTE—SEALED INSTRUMENT.

An instrument in the form of a negotiable promissory note, but with a scroll in which the word "seal" was written, thus, , after the signature of the maker, is a sealed instrument, and not a negotiable promissory note, though there is no reference to a seal in the body of the instrument.

Appeal from circuit court, Jackson county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge.

Francis Fitch, for appellant. H. K. Hanna and J. R. Nell, for respondent.

LORD, J. The plaintiff brought this action upon the following instrument: "$90.00. May 12, 1884. On or before the first day of October, 1884, for value received, I, or we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of D. M. Osborne & Co. the sum of ninety dollars in U. S. gold coin, at the office of * * *, with interest in like gold coin at ten per cent. per annum from September 1st until paid; and in case suit is instituted to collect this note, or any portion, I, or we, or either of us, promise to pay with reasonable dollars as attorney's fees in such suit.

Willow Springs, Or. C. C. PARKER.

It is alleged "that prior to the delivery of said note to the payee, this plaintiff, the defendant indorsed said note by writing his name across the back thereof, and thereupon said note was delivered to this plaintiff; that said plaintiff is the owner and holder of said note; that said note has not been paid, nor any part thereof; that said C. C. Parker and said defendant have failed and refused to pay the same; that twenty-five dollars is reasonable value of services," etc. A demurrer was interposed to the effect that no cause of action was stated against the defendant, and sustained, and, the plaintiff refusing to proceed, judgment was given for the defendant, and his costs, from which this appeal is brought.

The contention involved is whether the instrument sued on is a negotiable promissory note, and as such entitled to the special privileges conferred by the law-merchant. In form, the instrument executed is a negotiable promissory note, except that the signature has after it a seal, thus, . It is insisted for the plaintiff that, by the affixing of a seal to his signature by the maker of the instrument, its negotiable quality was destroyed, and it became a non-negotiable note; while it is claimed for the defendant that the mere affixing of a seal to the signature does not make it a sealed instrument, unless there is a recognition of the seal in the body of the instrument, by some such phrase as "witness my signature and seal," or "signed and sealed," for otherwise the door would be thrown open to frauds and forgeries by the facility with which such seals could be superadded; in a word, that the seal annexed is mere surplusage. This is undoubtedly the view taken by the Virginia cases, but which are conceded in Cromwell v. Tate's Ex'r, 7 Leigh, 301, not to be in harmony with the common law, and are largely against the weight of authority. Anthony v. Harrison, 14 Hun, 201; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 32; 1 Rand. Com. Paper, §§ 70, 71.

In this state, while a seal may be made by a wafer or wax attached to the instrument, it may be also made by a scroll with a pen after the signature to the instrument at the time of its execution and delivery. Nor does it seem that it is necessary that the scroll or seal must be recognized in the body of the instrument. For ARCHER, J., said: "If he execute and deliver it with the scroll attached, it being considered here as equivalent to the wax or wafer, it is as much his seal as if he had declared it to be so in the body of the instrument. The fact of the clause of attestation not appearing in the usual form of 'signed, sealed, and delivered,' can, in reason, make no difference; for the question always is, is this the seal of the obligor? And, if he has delivered it with the scroll attached, it is his seal, and must be so considered; for whether an instrument be a specialty must always be determined by the fact whether the party affixed a seal, not upon the assertion of the obligor in the form of an instrument, or by the form of attestation." In Brown v. Jordhal, 32 Minn. 137, 19 N. W. Rep. 650, the identical question raised here was thus disposed of by GILFILLAN, C. J.: "But the appellant contends that merely placing upon an instrument a scroll or device, such as the statute allows as a substitute for a common-law seal, without any recognition of it as a seal in the body of the instrument, does not make it a sealed instrument. Such words in the testimonium clause as 'witness my hand and seal,' or 'sealed with my seal,' would establish that the scroll or device was used as a seal. No such reference in the body of the instrument was necessary in the case of a common-law seal. Goddard's Case, 2 Coke, 5a; 7 Bac. Abr. (Brown's Ed.) 244. Nor is there any reason to require it in the case of the statutory substitute, if the instrument anywhere shows clearly that the device was used as and intended for a seal. It would be difficult to conceive how the party could express that the device was intended for a seal more clearly than by the word 'seal' placed within, and made a part of it. This was an instrument under seal." In Whittington v. Clarke, 8 Smedes & M. 480. THATCH, J., said: "Whenever it is manifest that the scroll is intended to be used by the way of seal, it must have that effect, whether it appears from the body of the instrument or from the scroll itself." McRaven v. McGuire, 9 Smedes & M. 48. In the case at bar, the seal is not simply a scroll made with a pen opposite the signature, but the word "seal" is written within the scroll, and made a part of it. In what other way the party could have more clearly evinced that it was intended and used as a seal, it would be difficult to conceive. As a sealed instrument, the contention for the plaintiff is that the effect of sealing the instrument, though it was in form a negotiable promissory note, was simply to destroy its negotiable quality, leaving it in all other respects subject to the rules of law applicable to non-negotiable notes, and that the defendant, by writing his name across the back of it before delivery to the plaintiff, as payee, rendered himself liable as a maker. Barr v. Mitchell, 7 Or. 354. Under our statute, "the seal affixed to a writing is primary evidence of its consideration. In other respects, there is no difference between sealed and unsealed writings, except as to the time of commencing actions or suits thereon. A writing under seal may therefore be modified or discharged by a writing not under seal, or by an oral agreement otherwise valid." Hill, Code, § 753. A seal, then, is still something more than a mere formality in the execution of the instrument under our law, but is a matter of substance, and not of surplusage, giving or imparting to the instrument certain legal effects which do not attach to unsealed instruments as the statutory limitation. 1 Rand. Com. Paper, § 70. Its effect was to deprive the instrument sued on of its character as a negotiable promissory note, and thereby to convert it into a bond, or single bill, or, as more often designated, a note under seal, which are not entitled to the privileges and immunities of the mercantile law. TILGHMAN, C. J., said such an instrument was "a bond without condition; sometimes called a 'single bill,' and differs from a promissory note in nothing but the seal which is affixed to it." Bank v. Greiner, 2 Serg. & R. 115. Mr. Daniel says: "If a seal be affixed to a paper in the ordinary form of a note, its character as such is destroyed; and it is thereby converted into the deed or bond of the maker, who is then termed the 'obligor,' and the instrument is not subject to the peculiar doctrines that are applicable to mercantile securities." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 32. A bond of this character is sometimes designated as a "single bill," or "obligatory writing," but more usually as a "sealed note;" but, by whatever name called, such an instrument cannot, with strict legal propriety, be termed a "promissory note" in the commercial sense, and is distinguishable in the incidents which attach to it. As a writing, it is an acknowledgment of indebtedness in a certain sum to be paid on a certain day, and differs from a promissory note in having a seal affixed to it, which operates to convert it into a non-negotiable instrument, thereby depriving it of its character as commercial paper. Muse v. Dantzier, 85 Ala. 362, 5 South. Rep. 178; 1 Rand. Com. Paper, §§ 70-73. The effect, then, of the seal was to convert the instrument under consideration, though in the form of a negotiable promissory note, into a non-negotiable instrument or note; and while it may be entitled to a statutory limitation, different from or longer than a non-negotiable note not under seal, yet, it being similar in other respects, it is subject to the same legal rules as are applicable to such non-negotiable notes. This being so, within the ruling made in Barr v. Mitchell, supra, that a person who signs his name on the back of a non-negotiable note before delivery does not, in a commercial sense, become an indorser of it, with the rights and liabilities of a simple indorser, but is liable as a maker, the action is properly brought against the defendant, who is liable as a maker. It results that it was error to sustain the demurrer, and the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

STATE ex rel. HARRINGTON v. KINNEY,
State Auditor.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 19, 1891.)

LEGISLATURE—COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Const. Mont. art. 5, provides that each member of the first legislative assembly shall receive certain compensation, and that after the first session their compensation "shall be as provided by law: provided that no assembly shall fix its own compensation." It further provides that no member shall, during his term, receive an increase of compensation under any law passed during such term. Held that, as the first assembly made no provision, as contemplated by the constitution, for the compensation of the members of the second assembly, most of whom were members of the first assembly, Act Feb. 18, 1891, passed by the second assembly, making the same appropriations for the compensation of its members as was contemplated by the constitution, merely carries the intent of the constitution into effect, and is valid.

McCutcheon & McIntire, for relator.

BLAKE, C. J. This is an application to the court for a peremptory writ of mandate, directing the state auditor to audit and settle a claim of the relator for mileage and per diem for attendance as a member of the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of the state. The following facts appear in the affidavit, and are admitted by the return: The relator was elected October 1, 1889, a member of the house of representatives of the state, and qualified and served as such during the first legislative session; that as said member he has attended the second session of the legislative assembly of the state since the first Monday in January, 1891, a period of 40 days; that a committee on mileage was appointed by said house, which inquired into and reported that the relator had and will have traveled 388 miles in going to and returning from the seat of government from and to his residence, by the usual route, to attend the said legislative assembly; that said report was adopted; that R. G. Humber, as the speaker pro tem. of said house, issued the following certificate to the relator: "State of Montana, house of representatives. $317.60. Helena, Montana, Feby. 13th, 1891. This is to certify that the state of Montana is indebted to F. Harrington for forty days' service as member of the house of representatives of the second legislative assembly of the state of Montana at the compensation of six dollars per diem, and mileage of 388 miles at 20 cents per mile. R. G. Humber, Speaker pro tem. Attest: CHAS. Z. POND, Chief Clerk." The relator presented February 13, 1891, the foregoing account to the respondent, and requested him to audit and settle the same, and give a certificate thereof, but he refused so to do in whole or in part. The second legislative assembly, by an act entitled "An act to appropriate money for the executive, legislative, and judicial departments for the fiscal year ending December 1, 1891, and December 1, 1892," approved February 18, 1891, made an appropriation for the payment of this claim of the relator and his colleagues. The respondent says in his return that he refused to draw a warrant on the state treasurer for the payment of said account, "for the reason that there is no law fixing the per diem and mileage of members of said second legislative assembly." This constitutes the sole inquiry at this time, and requires an interpretation of the following sections of the constitution: "Each member of the first legislative assembly, as a compensation for his services, shall receive six dollars for each day's attendance, and twenty cents for each mile necessarily traveled in going to and returning from the seat of government to his residence by the usually traveled route, and shall receive no other compensation, perquisite, or allowance whatsoever. No session of the legislative assembly, after the first, which may be ninety days, shall exceed sixty days. After the first session the compensation of the members of the legislative assembly shall be as provided by law: provided, that no legislative assembly shall fix its own compensation." Article 5, § 5. "No member of either house shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, receive any increase of salary or mileage under any law passed during such term." Article 5, § 8. We think it is evident that the constitution fixed the compensation of the members of the first legislative assembly of the state, and conferred upon that body the power to enact appropriate laws for the payment of its successors. Such legislation can be amended at any time, subject to the restrictions that no legislative assembly can pass a law which defines its own compensation, and that members cannot receive an increase of salary or mileage. It was also contemplated that the first legislative assembly would provide the statutes which were applicable to these conditions. But it is conceded, and we take judicial notice of the fact, that that assembly, through causes which are irrelevant to the discussion, did not discharge its functions by the passage of any laws. The second legislative assembly is in session, and is necessarily enacting statutes to carry into effect some provisions of the constitution, and thereby promote the general welfare, and afford the relief which should have been granted by its predecessor. It is a reasonable presumption that this omission or exigency in our history could not have been anticipated. It is contended that the act, which gives to the members of the present legislative assembly their compensation by means of an appropriation, was passed through their official action, and is, consequently, repugnant to the constitution, and void.

In the consideration of the questions pertaining to this controversy, it must be borne in mind that we are interpreting the charter of the government of the state, and weighing one of the fundamental objects for which it was framed and ratified by the people. In Com. v. Hartman, 17 Pa. St. 118, the court held that a state constitution must have a liberal construction, and we follow this canon of interpretation. What, then, was the mischief which the framers of the constitution labored to guard against in the sections supra? Their primary purpose was that a legislative assembly should not have the power to secure by the votes of its members extravagant compensation for their services. For this reason they were deprived of the privilege of fixing their per diem for attendance and mileage, and members who held over from a session by which either of these items had been increased could not receive the benefit thereof. The act making the appropriations supra has allowed to the members of the second legislative assembly the same compensation which is specified in the constitution supra. It is proper to state that the same persons, with a single exception, composed the house of representatives of the first and second legislative assemblies, and that one-half of the senators served therein. These representatives were elected for the "term of two years," which has not expired. "One-half of the senators elected to the first legislative assembly shall hold office for one year, and the other half for three years." Const. art. 5, § 4. While each of these bodies must be treated as a separate organization, yet, from a practical stand-point, the objections are as strong and relevant against the enactment of a statute fixing the compensation of a legislative assembly by the members of the first assembly, because there is a large majority (embracing all of them excepting eight) who have a direct interest in the result. We have already said that the first legislative assembly did not regulate this subject. Fifty-four members of the house of representatives and nine senators of the legislative assembly could not receive an increase of salary or mileage under the section of the constitution supra if a law of this nature had been enacted. Shall the relator be compelled to wait until the third legislative assembly meets, about two years from this time, and fixes his compensation which is now claimed? There is not a line of the constitution which supports the suggestion, and every clause relating to the legislative department deals with prospective laws. "No appropriation of public moneys shall be made for a longer term than two years." Const. art. 12, § 12. The act supra neither increased nor diminished the compensation of the second legislative assembly, but contained the amounts which had been inserted in the constitution, and which remain unaltered by any law. Obeying the rules for the construction of the constitution, which have been written by jurists from the foundation of the system of American state governments, and weighing the peculiar and exceptional circumstances which attend this investigation, we must indulge "every possible presumption in favor of the validity" of the act supra. We cannot say that the second legislative assembly, within the intent, spirit, and scope of the constitution, has fixed its own compensation. We are therefore of the opinion that the relator is entitled to the relief which he has prayed for. It is ordered and adjudged that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued in accordance with the prayer of the affidavit of the relator herein.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLING AND SIGNING.

Under Code Civil Proc. Mont. §§ 294, 301, providing that, when a motion for a new trial is decided upon the judge's minutes, a bill of exceptions must be settled in the usual form, and that all bills of exceptions shall be reduced to form and signed by the judge, a bill of exceptions purporting to contain all the papers, and stating "that all of the foregoing papers and evidence were of the files of said cause at the hearing of said motion for a new trial," and concluding, "Done and dated in this court," with the judge's signature, is not properly settled.

Appeal from district court, Deer Lodge county; D. M. DUFFEE, Judge.

Robinson & Stapleton and G. B. Winston, for appellant. Cole & Whitehill, for respondents.

BLAKE, C. J. The respondents move to strike from the transcript on appeal the paper designated as "Bill of Exceptions on Appeal," on the ground "that the same was not settled and allowed by the judge of the court below, as provided by statute." The action was tried by a jury, and the appellant made a motion for a new trial "on the minutes of the court." This bill of exceptions purports to contain the notice of intention to move for a new trial, pleadings, testimony, instructions, verdict, and judgment. The motion for a new trial appears to have been overruled July 24, 1890. The following statement is incorporated in the record: "That all of the foregoing papers and evidence were of the files of said cause at the hearing of said motion for a new trial." The bill of exceptions concludes as follows: "Done and dated in court this 27th day of September, 1890. D. M. DUFFEE, Judge." The Code of Civil Procedure provides that "when a motion for a new trial is heard and decided upon the minutes of the judge, and an appeal is taken from the decision, a bill of exceptions must be settled in the usual form, upon which the argument of the appeal must be had." Section 301. "All bills of exceptions shall be reduced to form, unless noted by the clerk, and signed during the term in which the same is tried. * * * The bill of exceptions must be signed by the judge who tried the cause." Section 294. Questions of practice, under similar statutes, have been considered in many cases, with the same result, concerning the principle involved. In the case at bar, it is necessary that the papers, which are enumerated in the bill of exceptions, should be authenticated by the judge to determine what constitutes the minutes of the court. They are to be brought before us for argument and decision. The certificate of the judge has been carefully considered, and adjudged valueless, if defective or uncertain when tested by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. What, then, was "done" September 27, 1890, by the judge in court? What definite idea relating to the bill of exceptions is expressed by the use of this term? No one can contend seriously that this is a settlement of this important record "in the usual form." As already intimated, the law does not tolerate any ambiguity of language in this matter. The authority conferred upon the judge to "settle" a bill of exceptions "in the usual form" carries with it the power to decide what shall be embraced therein. The bare signature of this officer upon a certain date does not prove that he has exercised judicial discretion. In Sansome v. Myers, 80 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. Rep. 212, the court held that mandamus will lie to compel a judge of the superior court to settle a bill of exceptions, and said: "If the petitioner had refused or neglected to so correct the proposed statement as directed, the judge would no doubt have been justified in refusing to settle the same, but not otherwise. This the findings show was not done. The respondent refused in the first instance to settle the statement, not to sign it." In January v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 537, 15 Pac. Rep. 108, the court said: "The bill [of exceptions] as originally presented was a transcript of the reporter's notes of the evidence and proceedings, and the court was justified in refusing to settle it." In People v. Getty, 49 Cal. 581, the court said: "The practice of making up bills of exceptions in the reprehensible form adopted in this case has become so prevalent that some measures must be taken for its correction. The judge of the court below would be justified in refusing to settle a proposed bill of exceptions when it is presented in that form, and we are of the opinion that it is his duty to strike it from the files." This legal distinction between the meaning and effect of the words "settle" and "sign" has been enforced in this court, and the bill of exceptions under consideration has not been settled according to law. King v. Sullivan, 1 Mont. 282; Taylor v. Holter, 2 Mont. 476; Daniels v. Insurance Co., Id. 500; Bank v. Irvine, Id. 554; Hardware Co. v. Sullivan, 7 Mont. 307, 16 Pac. Rep. 588; Sherman v. Higgins, 7 Mont. 479, 17 Pac. Rep. 561; Barber v. Briscoe, 8 Mont. 214, 19 Pac. Rep. 589. It is therefore ordered that the motion be sustained.

APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURT—ADMINISTRATION.

1. An appeal by an administrator from an order of the district court, on appeal from the probate court, sustaining objections to his final report, and from a decree of distribution subsequently entered, is not objectionable on the ground that two separate actions are united in one appeal.

2. The provisions of Civil Code Mont. § 421, subd. 2, and § 444, which regulate appeals from judgments of the district court rendered on appeal from inferior courts, and which limit the time of appeal to 90 days, do not now apply to appeals from the district court in probate matters, as Const. Mont. art. 8, § 11, abolished the probate courts, and extended the original jurisdiction of the district court to matters of probate; and appeals from the district court to the supreme court, in probate matters, are now to be taken under section 421, subd. 1, which regulates appeals from final judgments in actions commenced in the court in which they are rendered, and which limits the time of taking the appeal to one year from the rendition of the judgment. Following In re McFarland's Estate, 26 Pac. Rep. 185.

3. An administrator, who has no interest in the estate, cannot appeal as such from an order of distribution.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; WILLIAM H. HUNT, Judge.

On motion to dismiss appeal.

J. W. Kinsley, for appellant. McConnell & Clayburg, for respondents.

BLAKE, C. J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal. The substantial part of the notice thereof is as follows: "Henry C. Yaeger, administrator of the estate of William A. Dewar, deceased, hereby appeals to the supreme court of the state of Montana from an order made in the district court * * * on the 22d day of July, 1890, wherein said court sustained the objections then considered to the administrator's final report herein, and from all subsequent action in said cause, including the v.25p.no.14—65 decree of distribution made therein on the 30th day of July, 1890, and from the whole thereof." It appears from the transcript that letters of administration were issued to Yaeger, the appellant, in June, 1887, upon the estate of said Dewar by the probate court of Lewis and Clarke county; that his final account as administrator was filed in April, 1889; that the objections of the persons who purchased the interests of the heirs of said estate to the fees claimed by the administrator for his services were overruled by the probate court; that they appealed in June, 1889, to the district court from the order fixing the amount of said fees; that the district court made, July 22, 1890, the order which is specified in the foregoing notice of appeal, and reversed the decree of the probate court concerning said fees, and reduced the same; and that afterwards, upon the 30th day of July, 1890, the district court made and entered the decree of distribution which is described in the said notice of appeal. We will review the grounds of the motion which has been submitted. The respondent maintains that two separate actions have been united in one appeal,—that the first order, which is appealed from, was made by the court below in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under the laws which governed the territory of Montana; and that the last-named order was made by the district court by virtue of its original jurisdiction under the constitution of the state. This position has been thoroughly examined by the supreme court of the state of California, and is untenable. These orders are not treated as actions, in the legal sense of the term. "We hold," said the court in Estate of Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. Rep. 86, "therefore, that upon appeal from an order settling an administrator's account, all the proceedings leading up to it, including the evidence upon which it is based, are open to review. * * * The probate jurisdiction of the court is separate and distinct from its jurisdiction in ordinary civil actions." This question received the particular consideration of the court in Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 326, 9 Pac. Rep. 187, which was a case in which learned and eminent counsel were engaged. Mr. Justice THORNTON, in the opinion, said: "As to the notice of the appeals, if such notice is in one and the same paper in which the several appeals are distinctly designated, we cannot see that such notice is insufficient. Nor do we think that the majority of the court intended so to hold in People v. Center, 61 Cal. 191, inasmuch as such holding would be in conflict with the settled practice and the ruling of this court in all cases in which it has been called on to express any opinion. Some expressions are used in the opinion of the court which appear ambiguous, but there is nothing that indicates that a notice of more than one appeal may not be in one and the same paper, where the matters appealed from are so designated that it can be seen from what the appeal is taken." Among other cases which are cited is Estate of Pacheco, 29 Cal. 224, and the court commented thereon as follows: "The court held a notice of appeal from an order of the probate court made September 3, 1864, denying the petition of Penniman and others for the removal of Emeric and refusing to appoint Penniman, and from all orders and decisions made by the court in that behalf on that day, sufficient. It appears that there were two orders appealed from."

The respondents contend that the ruling of the court below in sustaining the objections to the account of the administrator is not appealable. The orders which are complained of were made in the district court more than eight months after the admission of the state of Montana into the American Union. This important question has been carefully considered in Re McFarland's Estate, 26 Pac. Rep. 185, and for the reasons which appear therein we are satisfied that the court can entertain the appeal from the order made July 22, 1890.

It is urged that the administrator was not interested in the estate of the deceased, and cannot appeal from the decree authorizing the distribution of the estate. The authorities support the proposition. The appellant was not an heir of the deceased, or a purchaser of any part of the estate. In Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 463, the executor appealed from the decree of distribution, and complained that the property of the estate had been improperly divided between the legatees. The court, in the opinion, dismissing the appeal, said: "The heirs and devisees or legatees interested in an estate are made parties to the proceedings for a distribution. Any one of them feeling aggrieved may appeal from the final order. The executor, however, does not represent any of these parties, as against the others; and, if they are satisfied with the distribution, he cannot complain because some have received less than they are entitled to." This case was followed in Estate of Wright, 49 Cal. 550. In Estate of Marrey, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. Rep. 896, it appears that the appellant was the executor of an estate, and also a legatee under the will. The superior court reduced the amount claimed by appellant. The appeal was taken by him as "executor of the last will and testament of Maney, deceased." The opinion of the court, by Mr. Justice McKINSTRY, is in these words: "The appeal of the executor from the decree of settlement and distribution must be dismissed. He cannot in any case litigate the claim of one legatee as against the others at the expense of the estate. (Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 463;) a fortiori, when he himself is the legatee whose claim he is attempting to maintain, at the expense of the estate, in his capacity of executor." In Merrifield v. Longmire, 66 Cal. 180, 4 Pac. Rep. 1176, the court said: "The appellant may have been interested as an individual in the distribution of the estate, claiming, as he did, to be the assignee of some of the heirs, but as administrator he had no interest. It is now well settled in this state that a decree of distribution will not be reviewed on an appeal by an executor or administrator, where he, as such, has no interest in the matter sought to be reviewed." In Goldtree v. Thompson, 83 Cal. 420, 23 Pac. Rep. 383, the court said:

"Executors, administrators, receivers, and trustees are, in their official capacity, indifferent persons, as between the real parties in interest. * * * The funds which come into their hands are held in custodia legis, to be distributed by the court to those who show themselves entitled to them; and it is their duty to distribute the money coming into their hands as the court shall direct." And it was held that such persons are not aggrieved parties within the meaning of the statute providing that "any aggrieved party may appeal." In the case at bar it will be observed by an inspection of the notice of appeal that "Yaeger, administrator of the estate of William A. Dewar, deceased," is the appellant. He has no interest, by reason of his official character, in the decree of distribution, and his appeal from the order of the court below made July 30, 1890, is hereby dismissed. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order of the district court, made July 22, 1890, is hereby overruled.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county: WILLIAM H. HUNT, Judge.

This is an appeal of Henry C. Yaeger, administrator of the estate of William A. Dewar, deceased, from an order of the district court, exercising probate jurisdiction, sustaining objections to the final account of the administrator, whereby the court disallowed certain fees by him claimed. There was also an appeal from the order of distribution. That appeal was dismissed by this court at this term, (ante, 1025,) and the case thus relieved of much matter contained in the record, and argued in appellant's brief. Before the admission of this commonwealth into the Union of states all probate matters were adjudicated in the probate courts of the counties. From these courts appeals laid to the district courts. Title 11, c. 3, Code Civil Proc. The territory became a state November 8, 1889. By the constitution, (article 8, § 2, and section 20, Schedule, § 4,) all probate jurisdiction was transferred to the district court, and the probate court went out of existence. The schedule further provides: "Sec. 13. All matters, cases, and proceedings pending in any probate court in the territory of Montana at the time the state shall be admitted into the Union, and all official records, files, moneys, and other property of or pertaining to such court, are hereby transferred to the district court in and for the same county, and such district court shall have full power and jurisdiction to hear, determine, and dispose of all such matters, cases, and proceedings." "Sec. 2. All lawful orders, judgments, and decrees in civil causes, all contracts and claims, and all lawful convictions, judgments, and sentences in criminal actions, made and entered or pronounced by the courts within the territory of Montana, and in force at the time the state shall be admitted into the Union, shall continue and be and remain in full force in the state, unaffected in any respect by the change from a territorial to a state form of government, and may be enforced and executed under the laws of the state." Henry C. Yaeger, appellant, was appointed by the probate court of Lewis and Clarke county administrator of the estate of William A. Dewar, deceased, on June 1, Co., (N. J.) 20 Atl. Rep. 762. Act Pa. May 13, 1887, regulating the sale of liquors, but declaring that it shall not be held to authorize the sale of liquors "in any city, county, borough, or township having special prohibitory laws," is not a special law. Commonwealth v. Sellers, 18 Atl. Rep. 541. An act empowering park commissioners to connect any public park with any part of any incorporated city, etc., is not local or special legislation, though there is but one city in the state whose parks are controlled by commissioners. Park Com'rs v. McMullen, (Ill.) 25 N. E. Rep. 676. An act providing that in a town which has been organized out of territory embraced within a city, the city council may regulate the number of justices of the peace to be elected, but the number shall not exceed the number allowed by law to other towns of like population, is in contravention of Const. Ill. art. 6, § 29, declaring that "all laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation." Tissier v. Rhein, (Ill.) 22 N. E. Rep. 848.

1887. The appraisement and inventory of the estate, approved July 23, 1887, shows $884.83 in money, and a large amount of real estate, making a total of $36,446.83. On April 11, 1889, the administrator filed his final account and petition for distribution. The account discloses that the whole amount of money received by him from sales of real estate and other cash receipts is $11,361.25; claims paid, $8,397.28; and expenses of administration, $2,954.22. In the latter item is included $1,501.77 administrator's fees, a percentage on $36,794.33, which was the appraised value of the estate. A. J. Steele and Lewis Davis, purchasers from and assignees of the heirs of the estate, and the persons to whom final distribution was to be made, objected to the final account of the administrator, in that he had charged his fees upon $36,794.33, the appraised value of the estate, whereas he should have charged upon $11,361.25, which was the sum actually received by him upon the sales of property and other cash sources. The administrator contended that he was entitled to fees under the provisions of section 253, Prob. Prac. Act, as follows: "Sec. 253. When no compensation is provided by the will, or the executor renounces all claim thereto, he must be allowed commissions upon the amount of the whole estate accounted for by him, as follows,"—then providing percentages for different amounts. The distributees relied upon the act of September 14, 1887, (Ex. Sess. Laws 15th Assem. p. 59.) as follows: "Section 1. That section 253, second division, of the Compiled Statutes of Montana, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to-wit: When no compensation is provided by the will, or the executor renounces all claims thereto, he must be allowed commission on all sums of money only actually received by him from the sale of property of the estate, or actually disbursed by him in the settlement of the estate, as follows." Then follows percentage to be allowed, and provisions that the same shall apply to all administrators. The probate court held with the administrator, and on May 13, 1889, overruled the objections of the distributees, and allowed the final account, with the fees as claimed by the administrator. On June 8, 1889, the distributees gave notice of appeal from this order, and on June 11, 1889, filed their undertaking on appeal, as required by law. The case is next met in the district court, on April 29, 1890, after the state had come into life, and the probate court had ceased to exist, and its jurisdiction and business had been transferred to the district court. Section XX, Schedule, § 13. On that day the district court directed that the clerk indorse the papers in the case nunc pro tunc, as filed July 3, 1889. This was done on application of the distributees, it appearing that no indorsement had been made on the papers of their filing in the district court. The facts which were the grounds of this application were set forth in the affidavits of R. H. Howey, probate judge in May, June, and July, 1889; of John Bean, clerk of the district court since November 8, 1889; and of John B. Clayberg, attorney for the distributees. The facts so set forth were not controverted, and were as follows: Probate Judge HOWEY, in pursuance to the appeal from his court to the district court, prepared a transcript of the docket entries on the case, and, on the 3d day of July, 1889, delivered the same, together with other papers pertaining to the said matter, to W. F. Parker, then clerk of the district court. John Bean, clerk, makes oath that since November 8, 1889, the distributees' attorneys frequently inquired for the papers in the case; that he made diligent search for the same, and could not find them until he called to his assistance W. F. Parker, his predecessor in office, when, on April 10, 1890, the papers were found filed away with other papers in the vault, where they had been placed by said Parker. J. B. Clayberg, the attorney, says that before November 8, 1889, he had inquired for said papers, and said Parker could not find them. Upon this showing that the papers in the case had been duly deposited with the clerk of the district court by the probate judge on July 3, 1889, and had been found in his office, the district court ordered that the case be docketed, and placed on the civil calendar of the court. The administrator then filed a demurrer to the jurisdiction of the district court to hear the case. The demurrer was on the ground that by the operation of the constitution upon the admission of the state the decree of the probate court became the decree of the district court, and the district court had no jurisdiction to review the order of a former judge. This demurrer was overruled. The appeal then being heard, the district court made an order reversing the probate court upon its ruling; that the administrator was entitled to $1,501.77 fees as a percentage on $36,446.83, the appraised value of the estate; and held that he was to be allowed $484.45 as a percentage on $11,361.25, money actually received by him from the sale of property. From this order the appeal is prosecuted. By the agreement of counsel the great mass of papers in the case is omitted from the record, and only sufficient is brought up in the record to exhibit the foregoing facts. The appellant administrator contends for the following propositions: (1) The district court had no jurisdiction to hear the case, and herein: First. The appeal was not in the district court until April 29, 1890, when the nunc pro tunc indorsement was placed upon the papers, and the case was ordered upon the docket of the court. Second. The foregoing proposition being correct, the judgment of the probate court became, by the transition to the state form of government, a judgment of the district court; and the district court could not sit on an appeal from its own order. (2) Even if the district court had jurisdiction to hear the case, the allowance of the administrator's fees should have been upon the basis provided in section 253, which would have been $1,501.77, and not reckoned as to be allowed by that section as amended in the act of September 14, 1887, by which the fees would amount to only $484.45. The law in force when the administration proceedings commenced must govern, and not the law passed during the proceedings, and prior to the final account and settlement.

J. W. Kinsley, for appellant. McConnell & Clayberg, for respondent.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) We will examine the appellant's position in the order above stated.

1. Appellant contends that the district court did not obtain jurisdiction of the case until April 29, 1890, when the papers were ordered to be indorsed, "Filed, July 3, 1889," and the case ordered onto the trial docket. It is not disputed that the papers in the case were duly deposited with the clerk of the district court, July 3, 1889. Appellant insists that they were not "filed" that day, but only on April 29, 1890, and the court had no power to make the nunc pro tunc order. Appellant misapprehends the signification of the term "file." To file papers is to deposit them with the proper custodian for keeping. The marking of them "filed" by the clerk is another matter, and is not the filing. Tregambo v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 501, citing Engleman v. State, 2 Ind. 91; Lampson v. Falls, 6 Ind. 309; and Bishop v. Cook, 18 Barb. 326. See, also, Harrison v. Clifton, 75 Iowa, 736, 38 N. W. Rep. 406; Holman v. Chevallier, 14 Tex. 337; Smith v. Biscalluz, 83 Cal. 358, 21 Pac. Rep. 15, and 23 Pac. Rep. 314; Howell v. Slauson, 83 Cal. 544, 23 Pac. Rep. 692; and Bouv. Law Dict. "File." The order of the district court of April 29, 1890, to indorse the papers, is not of great importance in this inquiry. That did not constitute the papers "filed." They were filed July 3, 1889, and the court, finding them so filed, properly placed the case on the docket of the court, and heard it. It was quite proper in the court to have the papers marked "filed" as of the day when they were filed, in order to preserve a memorandum of the fact. The cases cited by appellant are not in point: Raymond v. Smith, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 65; Metcalf v. Metcalf, 19 Ala. 319; Hudson v. Hudson, 20 Ala. 364. Those were all cases of an attempt to amend a record by entering a judgment nunc pro tunc, where the law required the solemnity of the record of a judgment, and nothing appeared in the record by which or upon which to amend. Mr. Justice BACH's discussion of the proposition in Territory v. Clayton, 8 Mont. 1, 19 Pac. Rep. 293, not cited by appellant, is satisfactory to our mind. But the principle of these cases does not interest us in this inquiry. There was no question before the district court of amending a record. The presence or absence of the clerk's indorsement on the papers was not conclusive. The indorsement was not a record, and ordering the case to be placed on the trial docket was not amending any record. We therefore find that the case was fully appealed from the probate court, and duly lodged in the district court, prior to the admission of the state into the Union, and the abolition of the probate court. Appellant argues from the constitution, section XX, Schedule, § 13, that only pending cases in the probate court were transferred to the district court by virtue of said section 13, and that this was not a pending, but a determined, case in the probate court, at the time of the admission of the state. It is not pretended that the case was transferred to the district court by virtue of the provisions of this section 13. It had fully and safely arrived in the district court, and belonged to that court, four months before this section 13 began to operate. Nor does section 2 of the schedule have the effect that appellant urges, viz., that the judgment of the probate court of May 13, 1889, was a lawful judgment of the probate court, in force at the time the state was admitted, and must therefore remain in full force. As we have above observed, when the state was admitted the case was wholly out of the probate court, and wholly within the district court. It had gained its new foothold long before its old one was swept away by the rising tide of the new order of things.

2. Concluding that the district court had jurisdiction to hear the matter, and pronounce the judgment, we will endeavor to ascertain whether its said judgment is correct. It is not questioned that, if the administrator's fees are to be reckoned as provided in section 253, before amended, the cases appellant cites construing that statute are applicable. Estate of Isaacs, 30 Cal. 113; Estate of Simmons, 43 Cal. 550; Estate of Ricaud, 70 Cal. 69, 11 Pac. Rep. 471. But the point in controversy is whether the old law or the amendment must be invoked. Appellant, insisting upon the former, relies largely upon section 276, Prob. Prac. Act, as follows: "The executor or administrator, as soon as he has sufficient funds in his hands, must pay the funeral expenses, and the expenses of the last sickness, and the allowance made to the family of the decedent. He may retain in his hands the necessary expenses of the administration," etc. This section is identical with section 1646, Code Civil Proc. Cal., which section the supreme court of that state construes to mean that the administrator's fees shall be ascertained, allowed, and paid only upon his final accounting and settlement. Estate of Miner, 46 Cal. 564; Estate of Barton, 55 Cal. 90; Estate of Rose, 80 Cal. 180, 22 Pac. Rep. 86; Ord v. Little, 3 Cal. 287. See, also, 2 Woerner, Adm'n, § 533. Under that construction, appellant's fees were to be ascertained, allowed, and paid on April 11, 1889. On that day the court allowing the fees goes to the statute for instruction, and finds the act of September 14, 1887. But the administrator contends that when he was appointed, and for three and a half months out of twenty-two and a half months, during which he was administrator, the unamended section 253 was in force; to which contention the court applies the rule that, if a statute is amended, it shall be understood in the same sense as if it had read from the beginning as amended. Surtees v. Ellison, 9 Barn. & C. 750; Peters v. Vawter, 10 Mont. —, ante, 438. (The exceptions to this rule by virtue of constitutional limitations will be considered below.) Under the general rule, then, it is unhesitatingly concluded that the amended law must regulate the fees of the appellant. Whatever right appellant had to fees prior to September 14, 1887, was an unascertained, inchoate one. If, by virtue of his qualifying and performing a few acts while the old law was in force, his right to fees accrued, and were to be settled upon the percentage allowed by that law, then it must also be true that, if he had resigned or died on September 13, 1887, before performing any labors, he or his estate would be entitled to all the fees provided by the old law. This absurdity is not contended for, yet it is as reasonable as the claim that, having performed the services, the fees must be reckoned by the provisions of a law in force when his administratorship commenced, but repealed before any fees were either due, payable, or to be ascertained. On the other hand, it is the law that, appellant's claim for fees being unsettled, unallowed, and inchoate, and the creature of the statute, (section 253,) it fell with the law creating it. An exhaustive and learned discussion of this principle by Judge COWEN, citing and reviewing authorities, is found in Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 324. See, also, Van Inwagen v. Chicago, 61 Ill. 34. The legislature of Montana territory, then, had the right, on September 14, 1887, to amend section 253, and diminish the fees to which appellant might become entitled at the end of his service, unless, on September 14, 1887, the claim of appellant was (1) a contract; (2) a vested right; or (3) protected by the act of congress of the United States of July 30, 1886, commonly called the "Restriction Act," the part of which material to this inquiry is as follows: "That the legislatures of the territories of the United States now or hereafter to be organized shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases; that is to say, [among others] creating, increasing, or decreasing fees, percentage, or allowances of public officers during the term for which said officers are elected or appointed." The constitution of the state is not before us for construction, as this cause of action was perfected and the controversy arose under the territorial government. Examining the above propositions, it is not necessary to indulge in any discussions upon the general doctrine that an officer's claim to fees allowed by statute is not a contract. See cases last cited, and People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 269; Butler v. Pennsylvania, 10 How. 402; Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. 1; Conner v. Mayor, 5 N. Y. 285; Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 813. See, also, cases infra. Nor is his claim to fees to be performed in the future a vested right. Cases supra and infra. But his claim to fees for services past, and wholly performed, upon a statutory fee-bill, in force while he was performing those services, might be a vested right, of which the legislature could not deprive him by a law diminishing the fees theretofore fixed by the statute. But let us see in what position appellant stands to invoke this principle. For the first three and one-half months of appellant's administratorship the old section 253 was in force; for the remaining nineteen months of his official relation to the estate, the amendment of September 14, 1887, was the law, (except the period of the law of March 14, 1889, which we will advert to below.) Appellant does not separate his services as to these two periods, and claim compensation upon services rendered in the three and a half months' period under the old law, and upon those rendered in the nineteen months' period, under the amendment. If he did so, and claimed a higher percentage upon services fully performed and passed, during the three and a half months' period, the argument of vested right would address itself to us with some force. People v. Pyper, (Utah,) 21 Pac. Rep. 722. Appellant does not claim that any services were fully performed in the short period, nor does the record disclose that he had so performed them at the close of this period,—September 14, 1887,—so that his fees could be ascertained thereon. He gave no data to the district court by which his services could be classified into these respective periods, and made no demand for such segregation. On April 11, 1889, it did appear that his claim to fees had accrued since June 1, 1887. It did not appear that any of it had accrued prior to September 14, 1887. The district court was therefore right in concluding that the services and conditions on which fees could be claimed arose subsequent to September 14, 1887, and properly, under the facts before the court, allowed the fees upon the basis provided in the act of that date.

The legislature seems to have never tired of passing acts upon this subject, and we are again confronted with their will as expressed in Act March 14, 1889, going into effect April 1, 1889, by which act the fees of public administrators and all other administrators are placed at 6 per cent. of the first thousand dollars, which is a reduction of 1 per cent. on the thousand from the fees allowed by Act September 14, 1887. Appellant's final account was rendered April 11, 1889. The question is presented whether the act of March 14, 1889, in force April 1, 1889, operates to reduce appellant's claim 1 per cent. on the first thousand dollars. The record discloses that every act and service of the administrator was completed prior to April 1, 1889. All his services, as far as are concerned with Act March 14, 1889, come under the class of past services fully performed, the fees for which were wholly earned, under a former fee-bill, before the act of March 14, 1889, was passed; his claim to which was, therefore, a vested and accrued right, with which the legislature could not interfere by that latter act. People v. Pyper, supra, and cases cited in Supervisors v. Allen, 99 N. Y. 532, 2 N. E. Rep. 459, and cases supra and infra. Returning to the restriction act again, we have to observe, in order that the restriction act may protect appellant's position, two facts must be found: (1) That appellant, in his claim for fees, was a public officer; (2) that the act diminishing the fees was a "local or special law." If either of those propositions be found in the negative, the case is concluded. The restriction act did not forbid the legislature of the territory from passing an act creating, increasing, or diminishing fees, percentages, or allowances of public officers during the term for which they were elected or appointed. It fell far short of the prohibitions of section 31, art. 5, Const., afterwards adopted by the people for the control of the legislature, and which inhibits the passing of any law increasing or diminishing the salaries or emoluments of a public officer after his election. The restriction act forbade only the passing of any local or special laws upon the subject indicated. The only inquiry, therefore, before us, is whether the act of September 14, 1887, was local or special. The operation of the act is not upon any particular person or officer, nor in any certain locality or localities in the territory. It applies to all executors and administrators, public and private, throughout the territory. What shadow or pretense of reason there is to pronounce this act local or special is not apparent to us. On the other hand, that it is not local or special seems to us perfectly clear, and so indisputably sustained by the decisions that to discuss the proposition, or review the cases, would be an unconstructive compiling of elementary and well-understood law. Suffice to refer to a few of the authorities: State v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law, 1; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. St. 338; McAulich v. Railroad Co., 20 Iowa, 338; *Haskel v. The conclusion last stated is sustained by the authorities cited, and it is not at all shaken by the cases to which the appellant has referred us in his supplemental brief. The cases he there cites were decided upon facts different from these now under consideration; and the law, as in those cases declared, does not affect the conclusion we have reached. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

MORRIS v. EDWARDS.

CONTRACTS—INTERPRETATION.

Under a contract for the sale of a stock of goods providing that the buyer is to pay "75 per cent. of the present wholesale cost at the present time, with freight added, at present rates and classification," the buyer must pay the entire freight, not 75 per cent. of it only.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clark county; WILLIAM H. HUNT, Judge.

This case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which the following appears: Plaintiff sold defendant a stock of goods. In their contract of sale is the following clause: "And the said party of the second part agrees to and with the said first party, who hereby assents to the same, to pay said first party, his personal representatives and assigns, for said stock in trade and merchandise, seventy-five (75) per cent. of the present wholesale cost at the present time, with freight added, at present rates and classification, to be paid as soon as invoice is taken, and the cost as aforesaid of the entire stock in trade and merchandise aforesaid is ascertained." In pursuance to the contract, the parties agreed that the wholesale cost of such stock was $5,309, and that freight on the same, "at present rates and classifications," was $1,327.25. Seventy-five per cent. of the valuation of the stock is $3,981.75. Seventy-five per cent. of the freight is $995.44. The sum of these two amounts is $4,977.19. This was paid by defendant to plaintiff. The difference between the whole amount of freight, $1,327.25, and 75 per cent. thereof, $995.44, is $331.81. Plaintiff claims that this additional sum should be paid. Defendant resists its payment. The controversy is upon the terms of the contract above recited. The parties agree that 75 per cent. of the valuation of the stock should be paid, but plaintiff contends that defendant should pay the whole of the freight; and defendant maintains that he should pay only 75 per cent. of the same; that is to say, that the words "seventy-five per cent." refer to the freight, as well as to the stock, or, in other words, that freight should be added to 75 per cent. of the stock, and not to the whole. The district court gave judgment upon the plaintiff's view, from which the appeal is taken.

Henry C. Smith, for appellant. J. W. Kinsley, for respondent.

DR. WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) No briefs were filed or authorities cited by counsel. This court must construe the contract, and from its terms find its intent. The language of the contract is of the nature of a Delphic oracle, and is possibly open to two constructions, but we are of opinion that the circumstances throw light upon the intent. The subject of the contract was the sale of an entire stock of goods. Its wholesale value was discounted 25 per cent. We believe that we can see a reason for this. It is known to merchants, trading as these parties were, that even undamaged goods become shop-worn, out of style, out of demand, out of season, and their salable qualities are variously affected by the simple lapse of time. Would not a buyer naturally demand, and a seller accede to, a reduction from wholesale prices for these reasons? Otherwise there would be no reason for a buyer to take such a stock. If he were to pay full wholesale prices, might he not better go to the wholesale dealer directly, and buy wholly new goods? We can thus see a reason for a reduction on the goods. But this reason does not obtain with freight. Freight is money paid for the transportation of goods. The money so paid does not deteriorate in value. It does not become shop-worn, out of style, out of season, out of demand, or, for any reason, unsalable. It is worth as much on old goods as on new. It is itself worth as much old as new. In fact, age gives it an additional value, if we consider accrued interest, which, however, is not here under view, for the parties agreed to freight at "present rates and classification." These words aid us in our view that the parties did not intend any discount on the freight. The contract is not clear in its terms, but we are satisfied, for the reasons above suggested, that the judgment of the district court must be affirmed.

HARWOOD, J., (concurring.) In view of the language of the contract, I regard the question presented to this court as a very close and difficult one. If in contracting for the purchase of a stock of merchandise, A. says to B., "I will pay you for this stock seventy-five per cent. of the present wholesale cost at the present time, with freight added, at present rates and classification," what do the contracting parties intend? In the foregoing proposition, in stating the terms, I have adopted the exact language and punctuation of the contract as found in the record. Counsel for the purchaser contends that said form of words means that both the price of the goods at wholesale and the freight shall be discounted 25 per cent. Contrary to this, the seller contends that the wholesale price of the goods only was to be discounted, and the present cost of the freight was to be added. Counsel for respondent suggests that there are reasons for discounting the price of said goods,—that some goods are shelf-worn, damaged, out of style or demand; while the freight, as an element of cost, was a fixed item of value in the goods, having been paid out, and would not suffer depreciation, and therefore the seller would not intend to discount that portion of the cost. I deem such reasons or suggestions entitled to no consideration in our attempt to interpret and ascertain from the language of this contract the intent of the parties in the particular matter in question. Such suggestions pertain to the motive of the seller for discounting the price of his stock of merchandise, and we have no evidence of what his motive was. It could with equal force be suggested that the seller agreed to the discount because he desired to engage in some promising speculation, or because he desired to retire from business altogether. If we had positive evidence that the motive for discounting the cost of the goods was because some were shelf-worn, or out of style or demand, still it appears to me that there is a fallacy in the argument that such damage or depreciation only affected one part of the investment in said goods. Suppose a merchant should pay one dollar for an article at the wholesale market, and another dollar for the transportation of said article to his place of business. Of course the cost of the article to him would be two dollars. Now, according to the theory of respondent's counsel, if said article should become "shelf-worn," so that its value was depreciated thereby, the depreciation or shelf-wear would all be upon the dollar of the cost paid to the wholesale dealer, and the item of cost paid by way of freight remains fixed and undiminished. As a result of such reasoning, the article would never depreciate in value below one dollar, although it became utterly worthless in the eyes of all dealers and consumers; and in case the owner sold the article, promising to discount the cost a certain per cent. on account of "shelf-wear," or without saying for what reason the discount was made, as in the case at bar, there would be a presumption that the seller did not intend to discount the item of cost involved in the freight, "for that could not become shelf-worn." I do not think that practical merchants are governed by such theories. Moreover, the contract before us shows by its own terms that no such considerations had any bearing upon the intention of the parties in stipulating for said discount. The damaged goods were excluded from the contract by the following provisions: "That such goods as toys, cards, poker-chips, smokers' articles, cigars, tobaccos, and notions, * * * incomplete sets, hanging-lamps incomplete," etc., "and all goods or merchandise which are cracked, chipped, or damaged in any way, are not included or embraced in this sale and agreement." And, further, the purchaser reserved the right by the terms of said contract to reject $500 worth of said goods at wholesale in case the parties to the contract could not agree upon the price thereof. It should be borne in mind that there is no evidence before us of the circumstances which surrounded said transaction, and the parties thereto, except the terms of the contract. "The circumstances under which [a contract] was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and the parties to it, may be shown, so that the judge be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret." Comp. St. div. 1, § 632. But in this case no such circumstance of the subject-matter of the contract, and of the parties thereto, has been shown to shed light upon the intent of the parties in respect to the particular matter in controversy. We have nothing but the contract to guide our endeavor to find the true intent of the parties. It is improper for this court in construing this contract to assume that any of said goods were "shop-worn, or out of style, or out of season," for there is nothing in the contract, and no evidence aliunde, showing that any of said goods subject to the contract were in that condition. It cannot be properly inferred from the language excluding certain classes of goods, and all "cracked," "chipped," and "damaged" goods from the contract. From all that can be gathered from this record before us, there is nothing to indicate that said stock of merchandise was an old or a new stock, or partly old and partly new. It is as legitimate for us to assume that the stock was all new and in season and style as to assume that any of it was shop-worn, or out of style, or out of season. We know from the contract that the subject of the bargain was: "All the stock in trade and merchandise, except what is hereinafter mentioned, in that certain store called and known as 'Morris Crockery and Glassware Store,' of said party of the first part, in the city of Helena, Montana."

No authorities were cited by counsel on either side. The conclusion I have reached in concurring is based upon the following considerations: It seems clear, in reason and on authority, that if the contract had stipulated that the purchaser would pay "for said stock in trade and merchandise seventy-five (75) per cent. of the present wholesale cost at the present time," and had stopped there, the freight would have properly been added as part of the "cost;" and of course in that case the discount would have been taken from cost of freight as well as the price of the goods, because the freight is properly an element of the cost of merchandise. Buck v. Burk, 18 N. Y. 337; Herst v. De Comeau, 1 Sweeny, 590; Goodwin v. U. S., 2 Wash. C. C. 493. But the contract does not thus provide; it separates the cost, or the price which the purchaser is to pay under this contract, into two component parts,—the wholesale cost at the present time, "with freight added" at the present rates. The freight was to be added to something in ascertaining what amount the purchaser should pay. The opinion of the learned judge of the district court upon this case is in the record. He observed: "It is admitted by counsel on both sides, and evidently intended to be embraced in the statement agreed upon, that the wholesale cost of the stock in trade and merchandise sold by plaintiff to defendant was to be estimated by the bills as they were contracted by the plaintiff at the place or places of purchase, and that in estimating such cost, and defining the words 'wholesale cost,' the significance should be the actual sum paid for merchandise at the point where the bill was contracted." Looking at the two distinct propositions, which, combined, make up the purchase price to be paid by the buyer, he held that the clause "75 per cent. of" should be limited to the first proposition which follows it, i. e., the wholesale cost of the merchandise at present prices. I am of opinion that such is the proper construction to put upon the clause in question, unless the contract clearly shows a different intent. I therefore concur in affirming the judgment of the lower court.

BLAKE, C. J. I think that my brethren have interpreted correctly the contract of the parties, and concur in the judgment.

STATE ex rel. MATHEWS et al. v. EDDY.

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT—PERSONAL JUDGMENT—VALIDITY—MANDAMUS—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

1. Code Civil Proc. Mont. § 80, provides that in case of attachment without personal service the judgment and execution shall be against the "property attached, as provided by section 73 of this chapter." Section 73 is silent upon the subject, as the part referred to in section 80 was repealed by Act March, 1883. St. Mont. 18th Sess. 51. Section 245 provides that, in case of service by publication and proper proof, judgment may be rendered for plaintiff for the amount due, in cases in the district court. There is no statute in the procedure act requiring that the judgment in case of service by publication shall be against the attached property, and it is provided that the procedure in the district courts shall apply to the justices' courts, as far as applicable. Sections 745, 792, 804-806. Held, that, in case of attachment of a non-resident's property and service by publication in an action in a justice court, a general judgment could be rendered for plaintiff.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Mont. §§ 802, 803, prescribing the contents of an execution, but not providing that in case of attachment it shall describe the attached property, and sections 194, 319, providing that the execution shall be satisfied out of the attached property, and that all property seized under attachment shall be liable to execution, the lien of an attachment is not lost by taking a simple money judgment; and the attached property may be subjected under a general execution.

3. Where a justice of the peace refuses to compel a garnishee to testify on the ground that the judgment rendered by him against the principal debtor was invalid, and that therefore he has no jurisdiction over the garnishee, mandamus lies to compel him to allow the garnishee to be examined, where it appears that the judgment was valid.

Appeal from district court, Silver Bow county; JOHN J. McHATTON, Judge.

Chas. O'Donnell, for appellants. F. T. McBride, for respondent.

BLAKE, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the court below in refusing to issue a peremptory writ of mandate upon the application of the appellants. The affidavit of the parties, who are beneficially interested, contains the following statements, which are relevant and material to this inquiry. That said John Eddy is a lawful justice of the peace of the township of Silver Bow, county of Silver Bow, and state of Montana. That said William H. Mathews and C. F. Curtis were doing business in Walkerville, county of Silver Bow, aforesaid, under the firm name of Mathews & Curtis, and commenced an action September 12, 1889, against Sarah Borlace, in the justice's court of said township, to recover the sum of $299 for goods sold and delivered to her by said Mathews & Curtis. That said Borlace left the territory of Montana, September 12, 1889. That on said 12th day of September, 1889, said Mathews & Curtis filed their complaint and affidavit for and bond on attachment in said action in said justice's court, and caused a summons to be issued thereon. That a summons and writ of attachment were then issued in said action, and placed in the hands of O. B. Benson, a constable of said county; and that said summons was returned by said constable with his return, showing that by diligent search he was unable to find said Borlace; and that said writ of attachment was returned by said constable, showing that he levied upon and attached, September 12, 1889, the following described property, to-wit: Money due said Borlace from Ben Clark, $27; D. Cunningham, $42; Frank Sands, $15; Al Abbot, $160; and that said parties acknowledged such indebtedness, and promised to pay said moneys into court. That said Curtis, as one of said plaintiffs, filed September 20, 1889, his affidavit with said justice's court, and obtained an order that service of said summons be made by publication in the Butte Mining Journal; that said summons was then issued, and published in said newspaper for the period of 30 consecutive days, to-wit, from the 22d day of September, 1889, to the 22d day of October, 1889. That the foregoing proceedings were had in said court when J. J. Hopkins was a justice thereof; and that said John Eddy succeeded, December 10, 1889, the said Hopkins. That the said Eddy, as the justice of said court, signed and entered, December 12, 1889, a judgment in favor of said Mathews & Curtis, and against said Borlace, for the sum of $299. That an execution was issued August 11, 1890, by the said Eddy, as such justice, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of said county. That said sheriff, by his deputy, one Richards, and said Abbot, went into the office of W. C. Shippen, who was acting as the agent for said Borlace, and said Abbot placed the sum of $155, the amount he claimed he owed the said Borlace, and the money which was garnished in his hands, upon the table of said Shippen; and that, while said money was on said table, the said Richards, as said deputy-sheriff, served said Shippen with a copy of the execution issued by said Eddy, and also a garnishee notice. That the said Shippen made, August 15, 1890, a return to the said sheriff, showing that he held in his hands as the property of said Borlace the sum of $29.90, and that he paid, August 14, 1890, to F. T. McBride, the sum of $100, and retained for himself the sum of $25. That Charles O'Donnell, as the attorney of said Mathews & Curtis, made, August 20, 1890, the affidavit required by section 803 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and obtained an order from said Eddy, as said justice of said court, commanding the said Shippen to appear before him at his office on said day at 7 o'clock, P. M., and be examined on oath concerning any money that he may have in his possession or under his control, and as to any debts, money, effects, credits, and other property owing to or belonging to said Borlace; and that said order was then served upon said Shippen. That said Shippen appeared at said time and place, in pursuance of said order, before said Eddy, as said justice, and was sworn according to law in such cases. That said Shippen was there with his counsel, F. T. McBride. That the said examination of said Shippen was postponed by said justice until August 21, 1890, at 9 A. M. That it was then postponed until August 22, 1890, at 10 A. M. That said Shippen appeared at said time before said Eddy, as said justice, and objected to any examination by the counsel for said Mathews & Curtis. That said counsel, Charles O'Donnell, demanded of said Eddy, as such justice, the privilege of examining the said Shippen, which was then refused. That said Mathews & Curtis, by said counsel, requested said court to make an order placing said Shippen in the custody of the sheriff aforesaid, for refusing to testify in this proceeding; and that said Eddy, as such justice, refused to grant said order, or compel said Shippen to testify; and that the hearing was then continued until August 22, 1890, at 7. P. M. That said Shippen, in pursuance of said order, appeared before said Eddy, as such justice. That counsel for said Mathews & Curtis then asked said Shippen several questions, which the said Shippen refused to answer; and that said Eddy, as such justice, refused to allow said counsel to put any questions to said Shippen, but ordered said Shippen to be discharged from further attendance at said court, and dismissed the said proceedings. And that this action of said Eddy, as such justice, has deprived said Mathews & Curtis of said sum of $155, or any part thereof, in the hands of said Shippen; and that they have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. The prayer is for an alternative writ of mandate commanding said Eddy, as such justice, to issue an order to compel said Shippen to appear and testify on oath, according to said section 803 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereupon the court below issued an alternative writ of mandate in conformity with the application of said Mathews & Curtis. The answer of the said Eddy "denies, on information and belief, that on March 12, 1889, or at any other time, the said petitioners filed any complaint in the case of Mathews & Curtis vs. Sarah Borlace in the said J. J. Hopkins' court, or any paper that from courtesy could be called either a complaint or account; denies that the said bond or affidavit on attachment was filed in said cause or court prior to September 12, 1889." The answer then admits that said Benson, as said constable, made the following return upon the writ of attachment in said case of Mathews & Curtis against Borlace: "I do hereby certify that I received this writ on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1889, and personally served the same by, on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1889, levying upon and attaching the following described property, to-wit: Money due defendant, Sarah Borlace, from Ben Clark, $27.00; D. Cunningham, $42.00; Frank Sands, $15.00; A. C. Abbot, $160.00; said parties acknowledging said indebtedness, and promising to pay the same into court. All done in the county of Silver Bow, M. T. Dated this 14th day of September, A. D. 1889. O. B. BENSON, Constable." The answer admits that an affidavit for the publication of the summons in said case was filed September 20, 1889; and admits that he, the said Eddy, as such justice of the peace, signed the judgment in said case, which is made a part of said answer. "And this defendant, as justice of the peace aforesaid, is of the opinion, and has so decided, that said judgment was not duly or regularly entered, for the reason that there never was any personal service of summons on defendant, Sarah Borlace, and she never voluntarily appeared in said case; and the statutes provide that when there is no personal service on defendant within the state, and no voluntary appearance on her part, the judgment and execution shall be against the property attached; and therefore denies that said judgment was duly entered against the said defendant, Sarah Borlace, for the said sum of $299.00." The answer admits that an execution was issued August 11, 1890, in said case, and alleges: "And this defendant is of the opinion, and as justice of the peace has decided, that said execution was not duly or regularly issued; the judgment upon which it issued not being in accordance with law." The answer further alleges: "As to the said W. C. Shippen being duly garnished under said execution, this defendant is of the opinion, and as said justice of the peace has decided, that he was not, for the reasons that neither the said execution nor judgment upon which it issued was in accordance with law." These averments respecting the validity of the judgment and execution are reiterated, and it is also stated in the answer that said Shippen "had never been served with garnishee process under the attachment, and no indebtedness or other property had ever been levied upon it in his hands under the attachment issued in this case." The papers which were filed in the justice's court in the case of Mathews & Curtis against Borlace appear in the transcript. The court below heard and tried the application for the preperatory writ of mandate upon the affidavit, answer, and papers. No opinion was delivered upon the entry of the judgment, but we infer from the argument of counsel that the reasons which have been given in the foregoing answer controlled the decision.

It will be necessary to examine the proceedings in the justice's court in the foregoing case of Mathews et al. v. Borlace. No personal service was had upon the defendant therein, but the affidavit for the publication of the summons was made according to the terms of the statute, the summons was duly published, and the proof thereof was made, and the property of said Borlace was attached by the constable. The respondent, as a justice of the peace, was authorized to enter a judgment in favor of said Mathews et al. and against the defendant. Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714; St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350. 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354; Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 529, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 704; Heidritter v. Oil-Cloth Co., 112 U. S. 294, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 135; Applegate v. Mining Co., 117 U. S. 255, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 742; Freeman v. Alderson, 119 U. S. 185, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165. In Cooper v. Reynolds, supra, Mr. Justice MILLER, in the opinion, said: "So, while the general rule in regard to jurisdiction in rem requires the actual seizure and possession of the res by the officer of the court, such jurisdiction may be acquired by acts which are of equivalent import, and which stand for and represent the dominion of the court over the thing, and, in effect, subject it to the control of the court. * * * So the writ of garnishment or attachment, or other form of service, on a party holding a fund which becomes the subject of litigation, brings that fund under the jurisdiction of the court, though the money may remain in the actual custody of one not an officer of the court." The answer alleges that the action of this justice in entering this judgment was void, and his counsel insists that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribing the form thereof were disregarded. The following language is relied on to uphold this view: "And in all cases where there has been property of the defendant attached to secure any judgment that may be recovered against him, and there is no personal service on such defendant within the territory, or voluntary appearance, as aforesaid, the judgment and execution shall be against the property attached, as provided in section seventy-three of this chapter." Code Civil Proc. § 80. The section thus referred to is silent upon the subject, and there are other provisions regulating judgments, which must be compared, to assist us in this investigation. The transcript shows that there has been entered in the docket of the justice's court all the proceedings required by law in the case of said Mathews et al. v. Borlace. The title specifies correctly the court and the names of the parties, and it is stated that the "judgment was entered against defendant and in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $299.00, costs of this action, constable fees, $8.90." The property which was attached comprised debts which were due from various parties to said Borlace, and amounted to $244. The requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to proceedings in the justice's court have been scrupulously observed. Under this title there is no section which defines or distinguishes the character of the judgment which shall be entered when jurisdiction of the defendant has been obtained by the publication of the summons and the attachment of property; in other words, there is no clause which is similar to the eightieth section, supra. It provides for the publication of a summons in certain cases, which embrace the action of Mathews et al. v. Borlace. Code Civil Proc. § 745. "When the defendant fails to appear and answer, judgment shall be given for the plaintiff, as follows: When a copy of the account, note, bill, or other obligation upon which the action is brought was filed with the justice at the time the summons was issued, judgment shall be given, without further evidence, for the sum specified in the summons." Code Civil Proc. § 792. It is further provided: "Every justice shall keep a book denominated a 'docket,' in which he shall enter: * * * Ninth. The judgment of the court, specifying the costs included, and the time when rendered." Code Civil Proc. § 805. "The several particulars of the last section specified shall be entered under the title to the action to which they relate, and at the time when they occur. Such entries in a justice's docket * * * shall be primary evidence to prove the facts so stated therein." Code Civil Proc. § 806. It is further enacted that "the provisions of this act in relation to parties to actions in the district courts, and relative to practice, pleading, and trial, shall, so far as the same are applicable, and do not conflict with this title, be observed in the justices' courts." Code Civil Proc. § 804. Therefore the contention of the respondent is that the eightieth section, supra, should have been followed in the entry of the judgment by the justice of the peace. We think that this construction of the statute is erroneous, and that the legislature, which treats with great liberality the pleadings and practice of the tribunals of this inferior jurisdiction, would not in such an indirect mode adopt a stringent rule concerning the formalities of a judgment and execution. But, conceding that the position of the respondent is sound, we find that the eightieth section, supra, is in conflict with the chapter which regulates "judgment upon failure to answer," and provides: "In actions where the service of the summons was by publication, the plaintiff, upon the expiration of the time designated in the order of publication, may, upon proof of the publication, and that no answer has been filed, apply for judgment, and the court shall thereupon require proof to be made of the demand mentioned in the complaint, * * * and may render judgment for the amount which he is entitled to recover." Code Civil Proc. § 245, subd. 3. These sentences are contained in the first division of the Compiled Statutes of Montana, which were approved at the same time, March 1, 1887. The history of this legislation should be reviewed. The part of the eightieth section, which has been cited, was added to the seventy-third section of the Code of Civil Procedure by an act approved February 23, 1881, (St. 12th Sess. 9.) The seventy-third section was then amended by adding the following: "And in all cases where the action is for the collection or enforcement of a moneyed claim, obligation, or demand against the persons upon whom such service is sought to be had, it shall also be made to appear by said affidavit, or other satisfactory evidence, that some property or effects of the defendant, or in which he has an interest, has been attached in pursuance of the statute in such case provided, describing the property or effects so attached, which shall be set forth in the order of the court or judge directing the publication of the summons, and recited in the summons published in pursuance of such order." St. 12th Sess. 9. By an act "concerning the publication of summons," approved March 1, 1883, it is expressly provided that said seventy-third section, "and all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith, are hereby repealed." St. 13th Sess. 51. Thus the portion of said seventy-third section, which is mentioned in the eightieth section, supra, was repealed about eight years ago, and has not been re-enacted. The expression above quoted, "as provided in section seventy-three of this chapter," is meaningless, and the reason for its insertion therein has long since ceased. It must be confessed that the intention of the lawgivers could have been declared in terms which would have removed every doubt regarding the forms of judgments which may be entered in the district courts. It is a serious question as to whether said eightieth section, supra, is valid, but it is needless to give an opinion thereon. In view of these considerations, we have concluded that there is no statute which requires justices of the peace to enter any other judgment than that which is recited in the record.

The same principles are applicable to the execution which was issued to collect the judgment entered against Borlace. The title affecting the justice's court prescribes the contents of an execution and the duties of the officers to whom it may be delivered. Code Civil Proc. §§ 802, 803. The execution, which is exhibited in the transcript, does not describe the property which was attached by the constable, but is framed according to the provisions of this title. The authorities which discuss these matters are harmonious. In Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 13 Pac. Rep. 73, the court said: "Our statute gives the right to service of summons upon defendants in all cases where they are non-residents of the state, without reference to the fact of their having or not having property here. The effect of a judgment thus obtained is quite another thing."

* * * The judgment, when rendered, does not differ from that entered in other cases upon a money demand." The court commented upon the statutes of that state, but we will give in lieu thereof excerpts from our Code of Civil Procedure, which are in substance the same. "If judgment be recovered by the plaintiff, the sheriff shall satisfy the same out of the property attached by him, which has not been delivered to the defendant or claimant." Code Civil Proc. § 194. "All goods, moneys, chattels, and other property, both real and personal, or any interest therein of the judgment debtor not exempt by law, and all property and rights of property seized and held under attachment in the action, are liable to execution." Code Civil Proc. § 319. The court then proceeded: "Under these provisions it has been held by this court that no order of sale by the court is necessary to authorize the sheriff to sell the attached property, and that the lien of the attachment is not lost by taking a simple money judgment without embodying therein directions for the sale of the attached property."

considered for that purpose and to that extent is not void. It is the method, and only method, pursued in our courts for subjecting the property of a non-resident debtor to the payment of demands due from him to our citizens; and the object sought is the essential thing to be considered, and is of more importance than the means by which the end is attained." The case of Low v. Henry, 9 Cal. 538, which was decided in 1858, is approved, and the court therein said: "We come now to consider the question as to whether the liens of the attachments were lost in consequence of the form in which the judgments were taken. The counsel of plaintiffs insist that the liens were lost 'by the fact that simple money judgments were entered up, without any directions for the sale of the attached property.'"

* * * There is no prayer in the complaint that the court should order a sale of the attached property. The lien of the attachment arises after the commencement of the suit. The Code contains express directions to the sheriff as to property attached. * * * There is nothing in the Code that requires any order of court to authorize a sale. For these reasons, we think the objection not well taken." In Cooper v. Reynolds, supra, the court further said: "But, if there is no appearance of the defendant, and no service of process on him, the case becomes, in its essential nature, a proceeding in rem; the only effect of which is to subject the property attached to the payment of the demand which the court may find to be due to the plaintiff. That such is the nature of this proceeding in this latter class of cases is clearly evinced by two well-established propositions: First, the judgment of the court, though in form a personal judgment against the defendant, has no effect beyond the property attached in that suit. No general execution can be issued for any balance unpaid after the attached property is exhausted." The application of the authorities to the facts contained in the record leads to one determination. The judgment of the justice's court and the execution issued thereon were lawful, and the answer of the respondent which sets forth their invalidity cannot be supported.

Another important question which has been discussed in the briefs cannot be determined upon this hearing. It appears from the record and admissions of counsel that said Abbot, when served with the writ of attachment by the constable, was indebted to Borlace on account of the purchase of real property in the sum of $155; that said Shippen, as the agent of Borlace, held the deed therefor in escrow, and would not deliver it until he received the consideration; that for this reason the said money was placed by Abbot upon a table in the office of Shippen; that the sheriff, by virtue of the execution, levied upon the money which Abbot claimed to be due from him to Borlace, and also served the same upon Shippen; and that the said deed was then received by Abbot. We have no jurisdiction in this proceeding to inquire into the respective liabilities of Abbot or Shippen to Mathews et al. under these circumstances. The debt, which was owing from Abbot to Borlace, has been regularly attached, and Mathews et al. are entitled to the fruits of their judgment. The respondent maintains that this security has been lost or impaired; and this contention may be correct, but we cannot adjudicate the issue without evidence offered upon a legal trial. The foundation for a statutory investigation has been laid, and it is necessary that Shippen and other witnesses should be required to testify in said justice's court concerning this indebtedness from Abbot to Borlace. Our inquiry is limited to a narrow scope, and we determine that the respondent should have proceeded with the examination of Shippen upon this subject. The respondent contends that the judicial discretion of the justice's court cannot be controlled by the writ of mandate, but this is not the ground upon which the appellants stand. The authorities are numerous in holding that the appropriate remedy was applied for in the court below. Harrington v. Haller, 111 U. S. 796, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 697; Ex parte Morgan, 114 U. S. 174, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 825; Ex parte Brown, 116 U. S. 401, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387; Ex parte Parker, 120 U. S. 737, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 767; Ex parte Parker, 131 U. S. 221, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 708; People v. De La Guerra, 43 Cal. 225. In Ex parte Parker, 131 U. S. 221, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 708, the court said: "The right of mandamus lies, as held in Ex parte Parker, 120 U. S. 737, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 767, where an inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction when by law it ought to do so, or where, having obtained jurisdiction, it refuses to proceed in its exercise." It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment be reversed, with costs, and that the court below issue a peremptory writ of mandate according to the prayer of the affidavit and application.

MINES—DESCRIPTION OF LOCATION NOTICE—VERIFICATION.

1. Where the location notice for a mining claim refers to a permanent monument, and is recorded in the county in which the claim is actually situated, the fact that the location notice, after giving the courses and distances, which show it to be in one county, describes it as being in another, will not vitiate the description, and the name of the county will be rejected as surplusage.

2. Parol testimony is admissible to show that the monument referred to is of a permanent character.

3. Where the affidavit to the location notice is not signed by the locators, and there is no jurat showing it to have been subscribed and verified, the notice is insufficient, under section 1477, p. 1054, Comp. St. Mont., which provides that any person discovering any mining claim shall within 20 days thereafter make and file for record a declaratory statement, in writing, on oath, describing such claim, as provided by the laws of the United States; and evidence alunde to show that the affidavit was in fact sworn to will not be received.

Appeal from district court, Jefferson county; THOMAS J. GALBRAITH, Judge.

The action is a contest between claimants of mining ground on the public domain of the United States. The plaintiffs below, respondents here, relied upon their claims of the Ida May and Corbett lodes. They were contested by the defendants, appellants here, with their New Brunswick and Crucible lodes. The gist of the case was reached by the partial sustaining of a demurrer to the answer, and a motion to strike out a portion of the same. Therein the court settled propositions hereinafter stated, and the trial following was pro forma. Four points are argued by counsel, and the facts upon which they are presented are:

(1) The location notice of the Crucible lode states, among other things, "This lode is situated in Vaughn's unorganized mining district, Lewis and Clarke county, Montana territory, and the discovery shaft is 335 feet from the west end of the claim. * * * The exterior boundaries of this location are distinctly marked by posts or monuments at each corner of the claim, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, viz.: Beginning at the N. E. corner, from which corner No. 4, survey No. 889, bears northerly about one mile; thence westerly 1,500 feet to post marked 'N. W. corner Crucible'; thence southerly 600 feet to post marked 'S. W. cor. Crucible'; thence 1,500 feet to post marked 'S. E. cor. Crucible'; thence northerly 600 feet to post marked 'N. E. cor. Crucible,' and place of beginning." As to this description the defendants plead, in their answer: "That the corner No. 4 of said survey No. 889, referred to in the said Crucible notice of location as being about a mile distant therefrom, lies wholly within the said county of Jefferson, is a fixed, definite, and permanent monument, and, taking the said notice of location, and starting at the initial point named, from the calls of said notice, one would of necessity, and without uncertainty, find the said claim in the county of Jefferson." It further appears from the answer that the notice of location was duly filed in the office of the county recorder of Jefferson county, and not of Lewis and Clarke. The court held that this location notice was not competent, as not entitled to record in Jefferson county, by reason of the statement in the notice that the claim was situated in Lewis and Clarke county; and also that the allegation and proposed proof that said corner No. 4 shows the claim to be in Jefferson county was incompetent. This is assigned as error.

(2) The location notice of the New Brunswick shows these facts: The notice itself is signed by the locators. Then appears an unsigned affidavit, as follows: "Territory of Montana, County of Lewis and Clarke—as. Charles K. Cole, being duly sworn, says that he is of lawful age, and one of the locators and claimants of the foregoing quartz lode mining claim; that said location is made in good faith; and that the matters set forth in the foregoing notice by him subscribed are true. ————— ERASTUS D. EDGERTON, Notary Public in and for Montana Territory. [Notarial Seal.]" Said Charles K. Cole was one of the locators, as appears upon the notice. The notice was recorded in Jefferson county. It further appears by averment of the answer "that said Charles K. Cole, the person named as affiant in the affidavit attached to said notice of location, in truth and in fact swore to the same before a notary public (Edgerton) therein named prior to the record thereof, and subsequent to Jan. 2, 1885." The district court held that this notice, not being sworn to, was not entitled to record, and defendants could not claim title thereunder. This conclusion must have been reached by taking the face of the affidavit alone, and disregarding the allunde matter pleaded in the answer. This is assigned as error.

(3) The New Brunswick was located January 2, 1885, and recorded February 5, 1885. The record was more than 20 days after the location. But it appears "that between January 2, 1885, and February 5, 1885, no person whomsoever occupied, possessed, or endeavored to assume to occupy or possess the claim or any part or portion of the said New Brunswick lode, other than the said locators above named." Was the record, under these circumstances, made in time?

(4) The Ida May location notice states: "This lode is situated in unorganized mining district, Jefferson county, Montana territory, and the claim is situated about one mile south-easterly of the Peerless Jennie mine. The joining claims are the Corbett quartz claim on the east; no others known." The Corbett location notice states: "This lode is situated in Frowner unorganized mining district, Jefferson county, territory of Montana; and the adjoining claim is the Leslie on the north." The point is made that these descriptions are not "by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim." Rev. St. U. S. § 2324. An opinion upon these two last points is not required for decision of the case; but they will be treated, for the reason set forth in the opinion below.

Toole & Wallace, for appellants. Comley & Foote and Shober & Rowe, for respondents.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) We will discuss the points in the order outlined in the foregoing statement of the case.

1. The Crucible claim was situated in Jefferson county. Its notice of location was recorded in Jefferson county. Its location description names corner No. 4 of the survey No. 889, which corner defendant alleges lies wholly within Jefferson county; and further alleges that the described courses and distances, when run by reference to this survey corner No. 4, locate the claim wholly in Jefferson county. It is not for the court to say, from an inspection of the location notice, whether or not this survey corner was a permanent monument. This is a matter for proof. Russell v. Chumasero, 4 Mont. 317, 1 Pac. Rep. 713; O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. Rep. 302. Then, if defendants had been allowed to attempt to prove this, as they had the right to do, and had succeeded ed, they would have been in this position: They would have shown where their claim was by reference to a permanent monument. They would have shown thereby that it was in Jefferson county, the county in which they had properly made their record. Are they to lose their claim because they stated in their notice that the premises were in Lewis and Clarke county? The statement of the county, in the notice, is not required by law; nor does it appear that it was required by any rules of miners consistent with the laws of the United States or the then territory; nor is it necessary in this case, in order to find or identify the claim. It was surplusage. Does this surplusage vitiate an otherwise good description, and a legal recording? Falsa demonstratio non nocet. See cases in 2 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 555 note d., and page 514. The rule applies the more forcibly in a case, as that before us, where the false description is surplusage. "So much of the description as is false is rejected, and the instrument will take effect, if a sufficient description remains to ascertain its application." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 301, and cases cited; also Wade, Notice, §§ 184, 185; Partridge v. Smith, 2 Biss. 183; Worthington v. Hylyer, 4 Mass. 196; Jackson v. Loomis, 18 Johns. 81; Reamer v. Nesmith, 34 Cal. 624. There can be no doubt that, if defendants be successful in proving what they allege to be the fact as to a permanent monument, the description is sufficient, and the error in stating the county, under the circumstances of this case, is harmless. We are satisfied that the district court erred. The notice of location is competent, and proof whether the corner No. 4 of survey No. 889 be a permanent monument is competent. Upon the subject of description of mining claims, see Gamer v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 371, 20 Pac. Rep. 654; Flavin v. Mattingly, 8 Mont. 246, 19 Pac. Rep. 384; Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. Rep. 728; Garfield, etc., Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. Rep. 153. The foregoing is sufficient for the decision of this appeal, but, as the case goes back for further proceedings, we will express our views upon the additional points raised, as a guide to the district court in the further consideration of the case; and, therefore—

2. The new point is whether the location notice of the New Brunswick claim is defective, by reason of the condition of the verification. This court, after incidentally doubting the validity of the law of the territory requiring a location notice to be verified, (Wenner v. McNulty, 7 Mont. 30, 14 Pac. Rep. 643,) afterwards, in O'Donnell v. Glenn, 8 Mont. 248, 19 Pac. Rep. 302, met the proposition squarely, and held the law to be good. While we can conceive doubts as to this power of the territorial legislature, we do not feel it our duty to disturb the rule in O'Donnell v. Glenn, and the practice established upon that rule. We therefore sustain the law, which is as follows: "Any person or persons who shall hereafter discover any mining claim upon any vein or lode * * * shall within twenty days thereafter make and file for record in the office of the recorder of the county in which discovery or location is made a declaratory statement thereof, in writing, on oath, made before some person authorized by law to administer oaths, describing such claim in the manner provided by the laws of the United States." Section 1477, p. 1054, Comp. St. The question, then, arises, is the location notice of the New Brunswick, with its attachment, "a declaratory statement in writing, on oath?" It is "a declaratory statement in writing;" and, if it is properly "on oath," the verification by Cole, one of the locators, is sufficient, without his co-locators joining with him. Wenner v. McNulty, supra. An affidavit is one method of taking an oath. An affidavit is "a statement or declaration reduced to writing, and sworn or affirmed to before some officer who has authority to administer an oath." Bouv. Law Dict. Appellant cites Shelton v. Berry, 70 Amer. Dec. 326; Jackson v. Virgil, 3 Johns. 540; Millius v. Shafer, 3 Denio, 60; Ede v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 57; Burns v. Doyle, 28 Wis. 460; and Crist v. Parks, 19 Tex. 234,—to the effect that the affidavit need not be signed. But the want of signature to this paper is not its most serious defect, if it be attempted to view it as an affidavit. There is no jurat thereto. It does not appear by the hand of the notary that the paper was either subscribed or sworn to, or that the party was ever present before the officer. We are not cited to any authority, or given any reason, that would warrant us in holding this paper to be an affidavit. In all the cases presented by appellants (last supra) there appeared some sort of authorization or certification from the notary, which evidenced the oath having been taken. In the paper before us there is nothing but the notary's name and official title. It does not appear that the party took an oath, or was ever present before the officer. We cannot call this an affidavit, or an oath by virtue of an affidavit, or by virtue of any certification. But appellants urge that an affidavit is not required, but only a statement on oath. Granted for the argument's sake; but have we any statement on oath? We have no notarial evidence of such fact. If the notary had officially certified, attested, or declared in any manner that the locator made the statement on oath, we would be inclined to view the matter more favorably. Certainly there is nothing whatever on the paper to remotely indicate that Charles K. Cole, the locator, made the statement on oath. In Murray v. Larable, 8 Mont. 212, 19 Pac. Rep. 574, there appeared at the end of a deposition an alleged certificate. It was signed by the deponent, and then followed: "Sworn to and subscribed before me, this eighteenth day of February, 1885. OMERE VILMORE, Not. Pub. [Notarial Seal.]" The court held "the simple statement at the end of the deposition, of 'sworn to and subscribed before me,' is no certificate of anything, except that the witness swore to and subscribed his name to the deposition." If, under those circumstances, the notary certified to nothing except that the deposition was subscribed and sworn to, then we must hold that, in the case at bar, the simple signature of the notary, without even the jurat, which was present in the case of Murray v. Larable, did not certify to anything. We are of opinion that the paper before us is not, intrinsically, a declaratory statement on oath. But counsel offer to prove aliunde the notice that the oath was taken after location, and before recording. Let it be remembered that the statute (section 1477, div. 5, Comp. St.) requires that the locator shall "make and file for record a declaratory statement in writing, on oath." It shall not only be made "on oath," but "filed for record on oath." We are of opinion that the statute intends that the oath shall be part of the record. Without directly so declaring, there seems to be a strong implication from analogy to other recording laws that one office of the oath is to entitle the instrument to record. We believe that any other view would open the door to abuses, mischiefs, and errors. Suppose notices may be recorded with no affidavit or certificate of oath, although the oath may have been actually taken by the party. There would be no official evidence preserved of the act of the officer taking the oath; and titles to valuable mining property would be made to depend upon the doubtful memories of notaries public, and perhaps years after the event, or even after the death of the notary. And the temptation would be opened to such officers to remember or forget, as interests ulterior to their duties might sway them. We feel that it is utterly unsafe to sanction such a practice. We are of opinion that the view of the district court as to the New Brunswick location notice was correct, and we affirm that ruling.

3. It is conceded by respondents, in their brief, that they claim no rights by virtue of the fact that their adversary claim, the New Brunswick, was not recorded within 20 days after discovery. That disposes of this point.

4. Under the view expressed in paragraph 1, above, and on the authority of Russell v. Chumaseero, it must be held that in the location notices of the Ida May and Corbett claims the reference to adjoining claims is sufficient to allow the notices to be introduced in evidence, and proof to be offered, whether such adjoining claims are permanent monuments. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

YORE v. MURPHY.

CHANGE OF VENUE — AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT.

1. In conversion, where the complaint fails to state the county in which the wrongful taking occurred, defendant, if a resident of another county, may have a change of venue, under Comp. St. Mont. div. 1, § 59, providing that the action shall be tried in the county where defendant resides, and that actions for torts shall be tried in the county where the tort was committed.

2. Where defendant in conversion is entitled to a change of venue, because the complaint fails to state the county in which the wrongful taking occurred, he cannot be deprived of that right by the joinder of another cause of action, sounding in tort, in which the county where the wrongful act was committed is properly stated.

Appeal from district court, Cascade county; GEORGE H. BENTON, Judge.

This appeal is from an order denying a motion for a change of venue made by the defendant. The complaint states two causes of action. The first is that on June 20, 1890, in the county of Cascade, plaintiff was the owner and in possession of a band of sheep, describing them, and alleging their value; that at said time, and while plaintiff was such owner, and in possession in said Cascade county, where she was keeping said sheep, the defendant did, against the consent of plaintiff, unlawfully and with force, take from the possession of plaintiff all said sheep, and converted the same to his use, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $12,775. The amount of damages alleged is the same sum as the value formerly pleaded. The second cause of action is that on June 20, 1890, plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of certain horses, describing them, and placing upon them a value; that on said day, while plaintiff was the owner and so entitled to possession, the defendant was in possession, and refused to deliver the same upon demand, and still refuses, and has unlawfully converted the same to his own use, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $700. The allegation of damage is in the same sum as the statement of value. The second cause of action varies from the first, in that the place of alleged conversion is not stated; and the wrongful act, if there be one, is stated to be in the retaining, and not the taking, of the property. The complaint concludes: "So that plaintiff avers that, by the wrongful acts of defendant hereinbefore alleged, she has been damaged, in the aggregate, by the defendant in the sum of $13,475, and she is entitled to recover of him that amount, with interest on the same from the dates of the said wrongful acts until paid." It will be observed that the aggregate damage alleged is the same sum as the aggregate value pleaded. The demand is for said sum and interest from June 20, 1890, until paid, and costs. Complaint was filed August 25, 1890, in the district court for Cascade county. Summons was served on defendant August 26, 1890, in the county of Lewis and Clarke. Defendant filed a demurrer October 4, 1890. On the same day he filed a written demand that the place of trial be changed to Lewis and Clarke county, and therewith an affidavit of merits, and an affidavit that the place of his residence was Lewis and Clarke county. That he was a resident of said county was not controverted. On these papers defendant moved for a change of venue, on the ground that the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county for the reason that defendant is a resident of Lewis and Clarke county, and was served with summons in said county. The statute in reference to change of venue is as follows: "Sec. 59. In all other cases the action shall be tried in the county in which the defendants, or any of them, may reside at the commencement of the action, or where the plaintiff resides, and the defendants, or any of them, may be found; or if none of the defendants reside in the state, or, if residing in the state, the county in which they so reside be unknown to the plaintiff, the same may be tried in any county which the plaintiff may designate in his complaint; and, if any defendant or defendants be about to depart from the state, such action may be tried in any county where either of the parties may reside, or service be had. Actions upon contract may be tried in the county in which the contract was to be performed, and actions for torts in the county where the tort was committed. subject, however, to the power of the court to change the place of trial as provided in this act. * * *

Sec. 61. If the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands, in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county. Sec. 62. The court may, on good cause shown, change the place of trial in the following cases: First, when the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county; second, where there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had therein; third, where the conveniences of witnesses, and the ends of justice, would be promoted by the change; fourth, where, from any cause, the judge is disqualified from acting in the action." The district court denied the motion to change the place of trial. From that order the appeal is prosecuted, and constitutes the only question before this court.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Respondent contends that the last sentence of section 59 fixes the place of trial in Cascade county, and retains it therein; while appellant insists upon his right to the change. It is necessary to determine whether the action is in contract or in tort; for, if in contract, it seems that the face of the contract must disclose that it was to be performed in the county in which the action was commenced, in order to lay and retain the venue in that county. But we need not decide that point, for we are of opinion that the action sounds in tort. In actions growing out of the taking or retaining of personal property, the pleader may declare in replevin, or in conversion, or may waive the tort, and sue upon an implied contract. It is sometimes difficult to determine which course the pleader has intended to pursue; but in this case we believe that it is determinable. There is a clear allegation of a wrongful taking in one cause of action, and a wrongful detaining in the other. In each there is an allegation of conversion, and in each a statement of damages to plaintiff. She demands a judgment for the amount in which she says she is damaged, which amount she lays at the value of the property at the time of conversion, and interest. The whole tenor of the complaint leads to the conclusion that the action is in tort. Then, as to the place of its commission. The tort set up in the first cause of action is explicitly alleged to have been committed in Cascade county. The second cause of action, for tort also, is separately stated. It nowhere appears in the complaint that this alleged tort was committed in Cascade county. We have before us no other source of information. We have no knowledge that the second tort complained of was committed in Cascade county.

Counsel have argued the construction of the last sentence of section 59, in connection with the previous portion of that section; but it is not necessary in this decision to construe those provisions. It may be assumed for the purposes of the case, as now before us, that the plaintiff has a right to have an action for tort tried in the county where it was committed, notwithstanding the residence of defendant in another county, and his service therein.

In this complaint two causes of action are joined. In one it appears by the complaint that the tort was committed in Cascade county; in the other it does not so appear. Therefore, as far as this court is informed by the record, defendant has the right (section 59) to have the second cause of action tried in Lewis and Clarke county, the county of his residence and of service upon him; and this right is not modified by the fact that this second alleged tort was committed in Cascade county, for it does not appear that it was there committed. And, if defendant has the right to have the second cause of action tried in Lewis and Clarke county, plaintiff cannot abridge this right by joining in her complaint another cause of action, (the first in the complaint,) which might be properly construed as triable in Cascade county. This position is thoroughly and satisfactorily discussed in Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 30, 21 Pac. Rep. 381. See, also, Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. Rep. 120.

In consideration of the facts before the district court, we are of opinion that defendant's demand for a change of venue should have been granted. It has been so held in Williams v. Keller, 6 Nev. 141, and Watkins v. Degener, 63 Cal. 500. The statutes of those states are similar to section 59, except that the last sentence is omitted. As that last sentence is in no way before us for construction, these cases last cited are in point, and we are satisfied with their reasoning. It is therefore ordered that the order appealed from be reversed, and the case is remanded to the district court, with directions to make an order transferring the case to Lewis and Clarke county.

KORNBURG v. BOARD COM'RS DEER LODGE COUNTY.

COUNTIES—ESTABLISHMENT OF BOUNDARIES—LIABILITIES.

1. Acts Mont. Feb. 8, 1889, § 8, providing for the establishment of a boundary commission, and v.25P.no.14—66 for the auditing of the expenses of a survey defining the boundary lines between certain counties, authorizes the boundary commission to ascertain the expense, and to certify the amount to the county commissioners, and, when so ascertained and certified, the county commissioners have no power to review the action of the boundary commission, or to demand from the surveyor an itemized bill of such expenses.

2. Section 5 of the act authorizes the commission to employ a surveyor and necessary assistants, and the county is liable not only for the wages of the surveyor, but of such assistants as he may employ.

Appeal from district court, Deer Lodge county; DAVID M. DUFFEE, Judge.

The action is by the plaintiff as surveyor, employed under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1889, (16th Sess. p. 231.) That act provides for the survey of the boundaries between the counties of Deer Lodge, Missoula, Silver Bow, and Beaverhead; that a commissioner shall be appointed by the county commissioners of each county interested, who shall constitute the boundary commission. Their duties are specifically defined. The sections of the act material to this inquiry are: "Sec. 5. That the said commissioners shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to employ a competent surveyor with the necessary assistants, who shall be paid pro rata by the respective counties interested, by warrants drawn on the contingent fund thereof." "Sec. 8. That all expenses incurred under the provisions of this act shall be ascertained by the commissioners appointed under the provisions of section one of this act, and by them certified to and filed in the office of the county clerk of their respective counties." There is a stipulation in the record as to what was the evidence in the case, and from that and the pleadings the following facts appear: That the several counties duly appointed their respective boundary commissioners; that the commission met as provided, and marked the boundaries as contemplated by the act; that plaintiff is a competent surveyor; that the commission employed him with necessary assistants to aid in performing the duties imposed by the commission; that plaintiff performed said services; that said boundary commission had a full and complete accounting with the plaintiff; that, on said accounting, there was found to be due plaintiff from the county of Deer Lodge, as the one-fourth of the value of the whole services, the sum of $1,826.44; that the boundary commissioners ascertained that said amount was due to plaintiff from Deer Lodge county, and certified the same, and filed said certificate in the office of the county clerk of said county. Two certificates seem to have been filed, one a certificate of the amount due plaintiff from Deer Lodge county alone, $1,826.44, and stating that the sum had been carefully computed. The other certificate gave the total due from the four counties, and presented it in four items as follows: Surveyors' wages, board of men, man wages, $5,372; for general expenses, transportation, and fitting out, $1,633.75; for office work, field-notes, and survey, $300. The plaintiff demanded from the commissioners of Deer Lodge county that this sum so certified be paid, which was refused. The said commissioners demanded from plaintiff an itemized bill for his services, which was refused. The plaintiff, on the trial in the district court, recovered judgment for the full amount of his claim, interest, and costs. The county appeals. Section 762, Gen. Laws, (Comp. St.) provides: "No account shall be allowed by the board of county commissioners unless the same shall be made out in separate items, and the nature of each item be stated; nor unless the same be verified by affidavit, showing that the said account is just and wholly unpaid; and if the same be for official services, for which no specified fees are fixed by law, the time actually and necessarily devoted to such service shall be stated; but nothing in this section shall prevent such board from disallowing any account in whole or in part, when so rendered and certified." The defendant county resists payment on two grounds: (1) That they are not bound to pay on the certificate of the boundary commission, but may require, under the provisions of said section 762, an itemized bill of the services, before they are liable to pay. (2) That plaintiff sues not only for his personal services, but for those of his assistants, and the expenses of the commission, except the commissioners' per diem compensation.

W. S. Shaw, Co. Atty., and Robinson & Stapleton, for appellant. Forbis & Forbis, for respondent.

DEWITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is undoubtedly the law that in accordance with the provisions of section 762, Gen. Laws, it is the duty of the commissioners of a county to require an account to be made in items, before they allow it; but the law making this requirement emanated from the legislature, and not from the constitution. The same authority, viz., the legislature, which provided a method to be followed in allowing accounts generally against a county, had power to provide a different method for certifying and allowing a particular account. This power they exercised in unequivocal terms, in section 8, Act Feb. 8, 1880. The account of plaintiff was to be ascertained and certified by a board specially provided for the purpose,—the board of boundary commissioners. Section 762 was not repealed. No one pretends that it was. But the one subject of the account in question was taken out of its operation, and given to another board. That board had authority and jurisdiction in its special matter, from the same high source, as does the board of county commissioners generally. When the boundary commission had acted within its powers, as it did, and in the absence of fraud, collusion, or bad faith, the board of county commissioners had no province in the premises but to pay the account as certified by the proper authority. The resistance of the county defendant is beyond our understanding.

The second ground of defense by the appellant seems equally untenable. The boundary commission were empowered to employ a "competent surveyor, with necessary assistants." The office of the commission was to make a survey. Necessarily, the only expenses of the commission (outside of the commissioners' per diem, which is provided for in another section of the act) would be for a survey. The reasonable construction of the act is that the commission should employ a surveyor with his own equipment, instruments, and assistants. It would be an unnatural construction of the act to hold that the commission should employ a surveyor separately, and then hire assistants, and buy and rent instruments, tools, and equipments. These accessories are all found with a surveyor, as part of implements of his craft. They belong with him as naturally as the tools of the carpenter or the library of the lawyer. The commission properly employed the surveyor, and he provided his own ordinary means of executing his work, and put in his whole account for the service to the auditing board provided by law, and it successfully passed the careful scrutiny of that board, the members of which had been chosen, and their capacity and integrity approved, by the boards of commissioners of the counties interested. The contention of the appellant seems to be without substantial merit. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

BARDEN, County Treasurer, v. MONTANA CLUB.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE—SOCIAL CLUBS.

A social club, not organized for the purpose of evading the liquor laws, but which furnishes its members with liquors and refreshments, without profit to itself, is not engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquor by retail, within the meaning of St. Mont. (15th Ex. Sess.) 74, which imposes a license tax on all persons who deal in, sell, or dispose of intoxicating liquors by retail.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; GEORGE R. MILBURN, Judge.

Bach & Buck, for appellant. Henri J. Hnskell, Atty. Gen., and C. B. Nolan, Co. Atty., for respondent.

BLAKE, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment which was entered against the Montana Club for the recovery of a license tax, under the following statute: "All persons who deal, in, sell, or dispose of, directly or indirectly, any spirituous, alcoholic, vinous, or malt liquors, in any quantity less than one quart, shall, before the transaction of such business, obtain a license for which he or they shall pay as follows." St. (15th Ex. Sess.) 74. The Montana Club was incorporated under the laws of the territory, and the articles contain the following certificate: "The particular business or objects for which the association is formed are as follows, to-wit: For literary, educational, and social purposes, and for mutual improvement and benefit, and to maintain in the said city of Helena, in said county and territory, apartments fitted with the proper fixtures, and furnished with the proper furniture and appurtenances, to be used for said purposes by ourselves, and our associates and successors, and to do each and every other act and thing necessary and convenient for the maintenance and perpetuation of a social club in said city of Helena." The articles bear the date of March 28, 1885. The transcript contains an admission in these words: "It was also admitted by the counsel for the state that the membership is about 225; that members pay their annual dues, in the case of resident members $40 a year, and in case of non-resident members $20 a year, and an initiation fee of $100; that the club pays a rental for its rooms of $100 a month, and it employs a steward at a salary of $100 a month; employs a bar-keeper, a man who takes charge of what is called the 'bar' of the club, at $100 a month, and three other employees, at salaries of about $75 a month each." It is also conceded by counsel that the club has a library and magazines and newspapers for the use of the members; that persons who do not reside in the city of Helena can be admitted to the privileges of the corporation for the period of 10 days upon the receipt of a card from a member; that the invited guests and members can obtain at the bar of the club all the liquors which are mentioned in the statute supra, upon a compliance with the rules; and the member who introduces a visitor is responsible for the indebtedness which may be incurred thereby, although the latter is primarily liable. It is further shown that the daily receipts from the disposal of the liquors by the club amounted to $40. The following among other findings were made by the court below: "That on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1890, at Helena, said county and state, the defendant corporation, through its agents, did sell and dispose of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in quantities less than a quart to its members, permanent and temporary, and continues so to do, and has made sales of liquors as aforesaid to persons from abroad, who according to the rules of the club had secured a temporary or provisional membership; * * * that the liquors disposed of by said defendant corporation were the property of said corporation, and were purchased by said corporation with corporate funds; * * * that said liquors were disposed of at a profit by said club." The conclusions of law were stated as follows: "(1) That the disposal of liquors by the club to its members, permanent and temporary, constitutes a sale of said liquors; (2) that the sale of liquors by the club to its members constitutes a business, for the carrying on of which the club is liable for the payment of a license." The fourth specification of errors is that "there is no evidence to show, or to justify the finding of fact by the court, that the defendant has ever disposed of liquors of any kind at a profit." An examination of the testimony compels us to sustain this proposition. Four witnesses were called for the state, and testified upon this point. Three of them were officers of the club, and stated positively that there was no profit in the sales of the liquors at the bar, and that a committee adjusted the prices for the sole purpose of paying the expenses thereof, including the purchases. Another person testified: "Of my own personal knowledge, I don't know of any profit made there to-day." The foregoing finding must be set aside and disregarded in reviewing the legal questions which are before us.

The authorities which discuss the problems to be solved in this case cannot be reconciled. Some of the decisions which have been cited relate to associations that have been organized for the purpose of evading and violating the law restraining the sale of intoxicating liquors. They are inapplicable to the present inquiry, for no charge of this nature has been uttered against the appellant. Such is State v. Mercer, 32 Iowa, 405. In the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice BECK referred to the articles of association of the "Winterset Social Club," and said: "They appear by the statement of counsel to have been nothing more than the foundation of an organization, the object and intent of which was to evade the law for the suppression of intemperance,—a rather clumsy device by which the defendant and the members of the 'Social Club' hoped to defeat that law, and establish a place of resort where they could be supplied with intoxicating liquors for unlawful use. The fact that, under the arrangement of selling tickets, the members of the club became the owners of the liquors to the extent of the money paid, does not make the sale of the liquors in that way lawful." The statute which was interpreted by the court formed a part of what is generally designated as a "prohibitory liquor law," and did not relate to any system of taxation. The case of Marmont v. State, 48 Ind. 21, belongs to the same class, and the opinion says that "the appellant was indicted, tried, and convicted in the court below for selling intoxicating liquors on Sunday, and permitting them to be drunk upon the premises." Chief Justice BUSKIRK in the opinion gives at length the statement of facts concerning the "Modock Club," and proceeds: "It is agreed that each member, upon his initiation, paid fifty cents, and thereafter a monthly assessment of ten cents, to form the basis of a fund for the payment of expenses and reliefs of the society; and that the money received for each glass of beer drawn for and used by a member of said association goes into the society's treasury, to keep up its funds for payment of expenses, procuring refreshments, and for reliefs; which expenses are for fuel, rents of hall, newspapers, the beer used, and the donations or reliefs payable to each member of said association, who, from sickness or other mishaps, may require assistance; and a standing committee from the members of said society is appointed to see after and inquire into and direct the payment of necessary reliefs in all such cases * * * When the society appointed the appellant its agent for the sale of its beer to the members of the association, it consented that each member might become the owner of such portion of the partnership property as he might be willing to pay for, and appropriate it to his individual use. If the transaction set out in the agreed statement of facts be not an evasion and violation of the law, then a number of persons may do that lawfully which if done by one person would be unlawful. It would be a reproach to the law and its administration if a combination of persons could, by such an arrangement, evade the law and thwart the legislative will." To the same effect are Rickart v. People, 79 Ill. 85; State v. Horacek, 41 Kan. 87, 21 Pac. Rep. 204; State v. Lockyear, 95 N. C. 633. It should be observed that these citations support the contention of the respondent that the transaction which is described in the case at bar possessed the elements of a sale. It must be further admitted that the following authorities are directly in point, and uphold the ruling of the court below: U. S. v. Wittig, 2 Low. 466; Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34; People v. Andrews, 115 N. Y. 427, 22 N. E. Rep. 358; People v. Soule, 74 Mich. 250, 41 N. W. Rep. 908; Chesapeake Club v. State, 63 Md. 446; State v. Essex Club, (N. J.) 20 Atl. Rep. 769. They assert, generally, that the property which belonged to the corporation or club has been transferred for a valuable consideration to persons who have received it; that the intention or good faith of the members who authorized such acts is immaterial; and that the law contemplates that the license shall be paid for the disposal of liquors in this manner. The opinions in some of these cases are elaborate essays upon the question under consideration, and their conclusions have been fairly announced. We do not deny their weight, and will not attempt to refute the reasons upon which they are founded, and will go further, and say that the controversy is surrounded by uncertainty.

There are, however, well-considered cases in which a contrary view has been expressed. Graff v. Evans, 8 Q. B. Div. 373; Tennessee Club v. Dwyer, 11 Lea, 452; Seim v. State, 55 Md. 566; Com. v. Smith, 102 Mass. 144; Com. v. Pomphret, 137 Mass. 564; Com. v. Ewig, 145 Mass. 119, 13 N. E. Rep. 365. In Graff v. Evans, supra, Mr. Justice FIELD said: "In construing a statute like the present, by which a penalty is imposed, we must look strictly at the language in order to see whether the person against whom the penalty is sought to be enforced has committed an offense within the section. It is not disputed that the club was bona fide a club. * * * I think the true construction of the rules is that the members were the joint owners of the general property in all the goods of the club, and that the trustees were their agents with respect to the general property in the goods, although they had other agents with respect to special properties in some of the goods. I am unable to follow the reasoning of the learned magistrate in saying that the question depends on whether or not a profit was made upon the sale of the liquors. * * * The section must be construed by looking at the language used, and taking a large view of the object of the legislation. The legislature have come to the conclusion that it is inadvisable that intoxicating liquors should be sold anywhere without a license. The enactment is limited to 'sales' of intoxicating liquors, and only seems aimed at sales by retail traders, because the wholesale trader is not touched. The question here is, did Graff, the manager, who supplied the liquors to Foster, effect a 'sale' by retail? I think not. I think Foster was an owner of the property, together with all the other members of the club. Any member was entitled to obtain the goods on payment of the price. A sale involves the element of a bargain. There was no bargain here, nor any contract with Graff with respect to the goods. Foster was acting upon his rights as a member of the club, not by reason of any new contract, but under his old contract of association by which he subscribed a sum to the funds of the club, and became entitled to have ale and whisky supplied to him as a member at a certain price. * * * There was no contract between two persons, because Foster was vendor as well as buyer. * * * I think it was a transfer of a special property in the goods to Foster, which was not a sale, within the meaning of the section." Mr. Justice HUNDELOSTON concurred, and said: "It seems to me clear that Foster had a property, or at least an interest, in the goods which were transferred to him. Mr. Hill rightly designated that interest as a one eleven-hundredth share. Foster, on payment, got from the bar-man who served him the interest of the other 1099 members, who thereby transferred their interest to him. There was no transfer of the general or absolute property in the goods to Foster, but a transfer of a special interest. That, in my view, was the result of the transaction. I cannot think it was a sale of intoxicating liquors by retail."

In Seim v. State, supra, Chief Justice BARTOL for the court said: "It will be observed that the license laws, (Code, art. 57,) which forbid the sale or barter of spirituous or fermented liquors without a license, have never been construed as applicable to social clubs, of which there are several in Baltimore city, where liquors are procured for the use of the members, and are furnished to them in the manner described in the present case; and we think it very clear that no license is required, for the reason that such a transaction is not a sale, within the meaning of the license laws. And, by a parity of reason, we conclude that the members of such associations as the Concordia is admitted to be, who obtain refreshments and liquors at the club by paying into the common fund the price fixed by the regulation of the society, cannot be said in any sense to buy them from the corporation, nor can the corporation be said to sell them to the members, within the meaning of the act of 1866. * * * The society is not an ordinary corporation, but a voluntary association or club united for social purposes. Each member must be elected, and each is joint owner of the property and assets, and entitled to the privileges of the society as long as he remains a member. Among these privileges is that of partaking of the provisions and refreshments provided for the use of the members.

These are not sold to him by the corporation, but furnished to him by the steward, upon his paying into the common fund what is equivalent to the cost of the article furnished, and what is so paid is expended in keeping up the supply for the use of the members. Such a transaction is not a bargain or sale in the way of trade, and therefore not within the purview or meaning of the act of 1866." In Chesapeake Club v. State, supra, the doctrine of Seim v. State, supra, was recognized, but held inapplicable, and the court said: "The language of the Sunday law of 1866, under which the case of Seim v. State was decided, is altogether different from that of the act of 1882, c. 112; and the decision in that case would seem to have been in the mind of the framers of the act of 1882, c. 112, for by the latter act terms are employed more comprehensive, especially those making the act applicable to associations and corporations, than are to be found in the Sunday law of 1866." A comparison of the statutes of the state of Maryland, which are referred to in Seim v. State, supra, and Chesapeake Club v. State, supra, illustrates clearly the distinctions which have been pointed out. In the first case, the court construed an act providing that "no person in this state shall sell, dispose of, barter, or, if a dealer in any one or more of the articles of merchandise in this section mentioned, shall give away, on the Sabbath day, * * * any * * * spirituous or fermented liquors. * * *" In the last case the court interpreted a statute embodying these clauses: "If any person or persons, house, company, corporation, or association, or body corporate, shall sell, directly or indirectly, at any place, or give away at his, her, their, or its place of business, any spirituous or fermented liquors. * * *" And, "in case of any violation of any provision of this act by any company, corporation, or association, each or any member of such company, corporation, or association shall be liable, and shall suffer imprisonment. * * *" In People v. Soule, supra, this statute was under consideration: "All saloons, restaurants, bars in taverns or elsewhere, and all other places, except drug-stores, where any of the liquors mentioned in this act are sold or kept for sale. * * *" In Com. v. Pomphret, supra, the court cites Com. v. Smith, supra, and the statutes in force when the decision was made, and Mr. Justice FIELD says in the opinion: "Nothing is contained in this act, or in any subsequent acts, which, in terms, relates to clubs, until the statute of 1881, c. 226, was passed. * * * The intention of this statute, however, plainly is to distinguish between clubs in those cities and towns whose inhabitants vote to grant licenses, and clubs in those whose inhabitants vote not to grant licenses, and unlicensed clubs in the former cities and towns are left to be dealt with under other statutes." The statute of 1881, which is mentioned in the opinion, uses this language: "In any city or town in which the inhabitants vote * * * that licenses shall not be granted, all buildings or places therein used by clubs for the purpose of selling, distributing, or dispensing intoxicating liquor to their members or others shall be deemed common nuisances; and whoever keeps or maintains, or assists in keeping or maintaining, such a common nuisance shall be punished. * * *" The court in Com. v. Pomphret, supra, stated: "It must be assumed that the decision in Com. v. Smith was known to the legislature at the time the existing statutes were passed. The inference is that the legislature intended that unlicensed clubs in cities and towns, whose inhabitants vote to grant licenses, must be dealt with according to the construction given by this court to statutory provisions similar to those in existing statutes prohibiting the sale, or exposing or keeping for sale, of intoxicating liquors." The amendments which have been incorporated in the laws concerning licenses are instructive. The Revised Statutes provided for the payment of certain sums by "any person or persons who shall keep any house, or saloon, or room where any banking game, or other game of chance, is dealt or played for money. * * *" Rev. St. div. 5, § 805. This section was amended to read: "Any person or persons, or association of persons, who shall keep any house or saloon, or room or club-rooms, where any banking game or other game of chance is dealt or played for money. * * *" St. (13th Ex. Sess.) 47. The last provision, and the act under which judgment was entered against the appellant, are found in Comp. St. div. 5, §§ 1346, 1350. In 1887 these sections were amended in some respects, but the peculiar phraseology which has been specified was retained. St. (15th Ex. Sess.) 74, 75. The decisions involving the liability of the appellant to pay the license under our statute are contradictory, but a slight modification by the legislative power would decide plainly and finally the question. There is no room for construing the act relating to gambling games. When these distinctions are so carefully preserved it is a reasonable inference that the legislature did not designate the business of the appellant in framing the law defining licenses. The court below erred in its findings and conclusions that the Montana Club at the times set forth in the complaint made sales of intoxicating liquors. This court cannot review the evidence in the transcript, and find the facts, and order judgment to be entered accordingly. Barkley v. Tieleke, 2 Mont. 435; Chumasero v. Vial, 3 Mont. 376. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment be reversed, with costs, and that the order overruling the motion for a new trial be reversed, and that the cause be remanded for a new trial.

FICTITIOUS APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Where an appeal is taken from an order in an action for a writ of mandamus, and subsequently the appellant obeys the order of the district court, the supreme court will not take ju isdiction of the case, and the appeal will be dismissed as fictitious.

W. S. Shaw, Co. Atty., and Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., for appellant. Cole & Whitehill, for respondent.

DE WITT, J. The relator applied to the third district court for a writ of mandamus requiring the appellant, Napton, clerk of the district court, to issue to relator a certificate of his mileage and attendance as a trial juror at that court. The district court ordered the writ to issue. The clerk appeals. But counsel inform this court that the clerk has obeyed the writ of the district court, and issued the certificate; that the decision of this court is not expected to affect this case; but that this appeal is taken only for the purpose of having this court establish a rule for the government of the appellant in the future. A judgment of any kind from this court would present a peculiar result. An affirmance would be to direct the district court to issue a writ, which that court has already issued, and which has been obeyed. A reversal would be to say to the lower court: "You may not order the clerk to do that which he has already fully performed." It is apparent that there is no controversy before us. The case is fictitious. We are of the opinion that it is not a safe precedent to depart from the rule that courts will hear only genuine controversies, and will not tender advice upon matters not in litigation. For the reasons stated we decline to take jurisdiction of the appeal.

STATE ex rel. ROOT et al. v. MCHATTON.

PETIT JURY—MODE OF DRAWING.

Const. Mont. art. 8, § 17, provides that the district court in each county which is a judicial district by itself shall "always be open" for the transaction of business, and that in each district where two or more counties are united the judges of such district shall "fix the term of court." Held, that the constitution does not annul St. Mont. 16th Sess. 186, providing that it shall be the duty of the judge of the district court, "at each regular term," to appoint jury commissioners. The act applies to district courts which are in session continuously, as well as to those having regular appointed terms.

Application for writs of prohibition and mandamus.

Toole & Wallace, McConnell & Clayberg, Nathaniel Myers, and Robert G. Ingersoll, for petitioners.

BLAKE, C. J. This is an application to this court upon the part of Henry A. Root and Maria Cummings for a peremptory writ of mandate to compel the judge of the district court of the second judicial district of the state, in and for the county of Silver Bow, to appoint three persons to serve as a commission in selecting a petit jury. The same parties have also filed an application for a peremptory writ of prohibition to command the said judge to desist and refrain from any further proceedings in the matter of the probate of a certain instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of Andrew J. Davis, deceased, until otherwise ordered by this court. The affidavits of the relators embrace, in substance, the same allegations, and the returns of the respondent are similar, so that a determination of the issues in one proceeding necessarily controls both judgments. The relators have submitted two motions to strike from the returns certain portions thereof, which will not be considered by themselves, because they must stand or fall with the main propositions to be examined. There is no controversy respecting the facts, and the sole question before us must be solved by the construction of the constitution and statutes relating to the impaneling of a jury in the district courts, which exercise jurisdiction in a single county. It will not be profitable to set forth fully the statements of the affidavits and returns, but the material facts appearing therein should be presented. Andrew J. Davis died March 11, 1890, in Butte, county of Silver Bow, aforesaid, and left an estate exceeding in value the sum of $8,000,000. Said Root and Cummings and others are heirs at law of the deceased. John A. Davis, a brother of the deceased, produced to said district court, July 24, 1890, a paper purporting to be the will of the deceased, and to have been executed in the state of Iowa, July 22, 1866, and by which the said estate, with the exception of some small annuities, was bequeathed to the said Davis. Said Root and Cummings within the proper time appeared and contested the will in the manner required by law. The issues of fact which were thereby raised were settled October 23, 1890, and the court on December 20, 1890, set the same for hearing February 2, 1891. The contestants filed, January 29, 1891, in the court, their demand in writing to have these issues tried by jury. The panel of trial jurors was obtained and drawn in pursuance of a certain order of the court made December 20, 1890, which is as follows: "In the Matter of the Trial Jury. This day it appearing to the court that the regular panel of trial jurors herein were on December 17, 1890, discharged from further attendance upon court; and that there is at this time no trial jury in attendance upon the court; and that a jury is necessary, there being several causes pending and set for trial: It is ordered that the clerk of this court, or his deputy, under the direction of the judge thereof, prepare a list of names of forty persons, competent to serve as trial jurors, and include the names of the persons so selected in a venire, directed to the sheriff of the county of Silver Bow, commanding him to summon the persons whose names appear in said venire to be and appear before this court on Monday, January 19, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. JOHN J. MCHATTON, Judge." The population of said county of Silver Bow exceeds 10,000. The contestants demanded, January 31, 1891, of the court the appointment of jury commissioners, and that a jury should be drawn in accordance with the provisions of the act relating to the drawing of jurors, approved March 14, 1889. They also moved to quash and set aside the venire, and discharge the said panel of petit jurors; but the court refused to appoint said commissioners, and overruled the motion. The district court for the county of Silver Bow, under the territorial government, adjourned sine die, November 12, 1889, and no order for the appointment of a jury commission was made during the term which then expired. Since the organization of the district court within the state, no petit jury has been impeached through the action of any jury commission.

The respondent says in his returns that "the district court of the state for the second judicial district has no terms or regular stated provisions of time for its sitting, but is always open, and there are continual sessions as in the constitution provided, and there has been no time at which jury commissioners could be appointed by this defendant; and the first section of said act of March 14, 1889, has by the provisions of the constitution been superseded and annulled, so far as applicable to said district court." The respondent also alleges that he has followed the requirements of the fifteenth section of said act, which is in these words: "If during a term of the district court a lawful petit jury is not present, and one is wanted, it shall be lawful for the judge of the court, and the clerk of such court, or his deputy, under the direction of the judge, to prepare a list of the names of at least twenty-four competent persons, to serve as trial jurors for such term. After such list is so prepared, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court, or his deputy, to issue a venire containing the names of the persons selected as aforesaid, and to place the same in the hands of the sheriff, who shall thereupon summon such persons to appear before such court upon the day named in such venire, and fixed by the judge of such court. The persons so drawn and summoned, and not excused by the court, shall constitute the panel of petit jurors for such term. If, during the progress of any trial of any cause in such court where a jury has been drawn as in this section provided, it shall become necessary for any cause to summon additional jurors, such additional jurors shall be drawn and summoned by an open venire, in accordance with the provisions of section two hundred and fifty-five of the first division of the Compiled Laws of Montana, and the acts amendatory thereto." St. 16th Sess. 168. The first section of the act which is mentioned in the return is as follows: "It shall be the duty of the judge of the district court, at each regular term that shall be holden in any county, to appoint three persons of honor and respectability, not parties litigant to any matter pending in such court, and who shall have resided in such county at least two years next preceding, and shall also possess the qualification required by law for jurors, to constitute jointly, along with the judge of probate of said county and the county clerk, a commission to select a grand and petit jury, whose duty it shall be to serve at the next regular term of said court in each county." St. 16th Sess. 166. The manner in which this commission shall discharge its duty is carefully defined, and the fifth section of the act should be noticed in this inquiry: "The jury commissioners for such county shall then proceed to draw a petit jury for the next ensuing term of court, in manner following: In any county where the population exceeds ten thousand, such commissioners shall select the names of three hundred persons lawfully qualified to serve as jurors, from the county assessor's books of the county; * * * and the names of the persons so selected, after being written on separate slips of paper, shall be deposited in a box to be provided for such purpose, and well shaken up, and from the names so deposited the jury commissioners shall alternately draw the names of thirty persons, who shall be summoned as trial jurors for the next ensuing term of such district court." St. 16th Sess. 166. The particular steps which must be taken after these services have been performed are pointed out in other paragraphs of the law, which do not affect the discussion.

It must be admitted that the statute regarding the appointment of a jury commission was enforced throughout the territory, and that there is no difficulty in carrying into effect its provisions in the judicial districts of the state which comprise more than one county. But the respondent maintains that there exists in his district an insurmountable obstacle to its execution, which has been created by this section of the constitution: "The district court in each county which is a judicial district by itself shall always be open for the transaction of business, except on legal holidays and non-judicial days. In each district where two or more counties are united, until otherwise provided by law, the judges of such district shall fix the term of court, provided that there shall be at least four terms a year held in each county." Const. art. 8, § 17. It is claimed by the respondent that the regular terms or stated times of holding the district court in the county of Silver Bow have been thereby abolished, and that the act concerning the jury commissioners has lost its vitality, or been rendered impracticable.

What, then, is a "term" of court? The importance of a precise definition of this legal phrase is obvious when the language of the returns is remembered, and also the constitution and laws, supra. It is often employed in the Compiled Statutes, and a reference thereto may afford some light upon our path. The Code of Civil Procedure provides for the relief in certain cases of a party who "has been unable to apply * * * during the term at which such judgment, order, or proceeding complained of was taken," and whose application has been "made within a reasonable time, not exceeding five months after the adjournment of the term." Code Civil Proc. § 116. "The clerk shall enter causes upon the calendar of the court according to the date of the issue. Causes once placed upon the calendar, for a general or special term, if not tried or heard at such term, shall remain upon the calendar from court to court, until finally disposed of." Code Civil Proc. § 251. "A final adjournment of the court for the term shall discharge the jury." Code Civil Proc. § 269. "When, on the day appointed for the commencement of any term of the district court, the * * * Judge of such court being not present to hold the same, the clerk of the court shall adjourn such term of court from day to day until the expiration of one week from the day appointed for the commencement of the term; * * * and if the * * * Judge of such court be not then present to hold such term on the day one week from the time appointed for such term to commence, the clerk shall adjourn the court for the term." Code Civil Proc. § 531. "There shall be regular terms of the probate court held in the several counties of the territory on the first Mondays of January, March, July, September, and November of each year for the transaction of probate business. The probate courts shall be always open for the transaction of all business within their jurisdiction." Code Civil Proc. § 709. The criminal practice act requires a magistrate in some cases to commit a defendant to jail, "to be held to appear at the following term of the district court." Crim. Prac. Act, § 96. He shall take a recognizance from each material witness, "conditioned to pay the sum of five hundred dollars, should he fail to appear and testify, as required, at the term of court at which the defendant is required to appear." Crim. Prac. Act, § 99. Provision is made for witnesses who may be taken into custody "awaiting a term of court." Crim. Prac. Act, § 102. "All examinations and recognizances taken by any magistrate, as provided herein, shall be certified and returned by him to the clerk of the court * * * on or before the first day of the next term thereof." Crim. Prac. Act, § 105.

If the position of the respondent is correct, and there can be no terms of the district court in the judicial districts which include respectively one county, a remarkable conclusion must be declared. Juries would be impaneled in one forum by a mode which would be different from that pursued in other courts of equal jurisdiction, and the wholesome part of the act authorizing the jury commission would be obeyed in 12 counties and ignored in the remainder of the state. We will not express any opinion as to the force of this interpretation upon the above citations from the Code of Civil Procedure and criminal practice act. In Horton v. Miller, 38 Pa. St. 270, Mr. Justice THOMPSON in the opinion says: "Terms of court 'are those times or seasons of the year which are set apart for the dispatch of business in the superior courts of common law.' 1 Tidd, Pr. 105. Sir Henry Spelman traces their origin to the canonical constitutions of the church, which the four ordinary feasts of Hilary, Easter, Trinity, and Michaelmas, being the names of the four terms of the courts of common law in England, very clearly indicate to be their true origin. * * * But still, terms, definite and fixed, are prescribed and are absolutely necessary to the successful administration of the judicial duty, so far as the public is concerned; and hence they are with us fixed by positive law." In Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U. S. 410, Mr. Justice MILLER for the court says: "In this country all courts have terms and vacations. The time of the commencement of every term, if there be half a dozen a year, is fixed by statute, and the end of it by the final adjournment of the court for the term. This is the case with regard to all the courts of the United States, and if there be exceptions in the state courts, they are unimportant." There is no act which prescribes the time when the terms of the district court shall begin or end, and by virtue of the acts of congress the judges of the supreme court of the territory of Montana were clothed with this power. Rev. St. U. S. § 1914. The constitution has expressly empowered the judges of certain districts to fix the terms of the courts, subject to a limitation as to the number which must be held in every year, and also "until otherwise provided by law." A mandatory rule of interpretation is laid down in this explicit section: "All laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state; and the organization, jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice of all courts of the same class or grade, so far as regulated by law, shall be uniform." Const. art. 8, § 26. Therefore there must be one statute, for the impaneling of a petit jury by each district court of the state, and the rights of parties which are dependent upon the commencement, duration, or adjournment of its terms, and which have been secured in the above extracts from the Code of Civil Procedure and criminal practice act, must be the same in every county. The 709th section of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, contains expressions which are similar to those of the constitution, supra, and is a valuable aid in ascertaining its meaning. It provided for definite terms of the probate courts, and further, that they "shall always be open for the transaction of all business within their jurisdiction." There is no inconsistent matter or repugnancy in these clauses. Another resemblance to the conditions which confront us should be commented on. A probate court was formerly organized in every county of the territory, and the judge thereof was obliged to "keep his office at the county-seat," and "keep the same open during the business hours of each day, (Sundays excepted.)" Comp. St. div. 5, § 911. The judge of a district court, which has jurisdiction over two or more counties, from the necessity of the situation, must notify litigants and all whom it may concern of the times when he will be present to transact the public business. During most of the year he would probably be absent from the counties in which he does not reside, and for this reason the framers of the constitution have declared that the judge "shall fix the term of court." While no direction thereon is expressed for the officer who occupies the public trust of the respondent, his discretion is not restrained by prohibitory words. The respondent appears to have assumed that the construction was within the principle of the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The fifteenth section of the act, supra, on which the respondent places his reliance, and fortifies his defense, mentions a "term of the district court," and says that certain persons "shall constitute the panel of petit jurors for such term." We say unhesitatingly that a district court without terms is a legal impossibility, and the constitution and statutes, supra, recognize and sanction the proposition. We think that ample authority is conferred upon the respondent to designate the terms of his court by the Code of Civil Procedure, which says: "The supreme court, and each of the district courts, shall respectively have power to make rules and regulations for governing their practice and procedure, in reference to all matters not provided for by law." Code Civil Proc. § 523. This authority, when put in motion under the circumstances disclosed in these proceedings, has the strength of a statute. The constitution has, by general and special expressions, continued in perfect vigor every provision of the law creating a jury commission. "All laws enacted by the legislative assembly of the territory of Montana, and in force at the time the state shall be admitted into the Union, and not inconsistent with this constitution, or the constitution or laws of the United States of America, shall be and remain in full force as the laws of the state, until altered or repealed, or until they expire by their own limitation; * * * and provided, further, that the duties which now by law devolve upon probate judges as jury commissioners * * * shall, until otherwise provided by law, devolve upon and be performed by the clerks of district courts in their respective counties." Section XX, Schedule, § 1. The distinct office of the probate judge was abolished when the government of the state was inspired with political life, and the constitution has wisely ordained that the integrity of the jury commission shall be preserved by designating the person to fill the vacancy which had been caused by the change. We have examined the rules of practice which have been adopted by the respondent, and find that he has not fixed the terms of his court according to the views which have been upheld by us. This is an omission which should be promptly remedied. The relators have saved their exception to the action of the respondent with reference to the impaneling of the jury in his court. Under the statutes governing the issuance of the writs of mandamus and prohibition, and authority, we think that the relators are entitled to the relief which they have sought in this court. We cannot conclude these observations without commending the conduct of the respondent, who seems to have been led into error by a misapprehension of the language of the seventeenth section, supra, of the constitution, and who has, in a spirit of candor, requested us to remove the cloud of doubt which has obscured the subjects that have been considered. Wherefore it is ordered and adjudged that a peremptory writ of mandate and a peremptory writ of prohibition

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 9, 1891.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—VALIDITY—PRIORITIES.

1. A chattel mortgage on a lot of specifically described articles, fixtures, etc., and "also all the wines, liquors, and cigars now in and upon said premises, of whatever kind, character, or description, whether for consumption or otherwise," and providing that the mortgagor shall "have the right to remain in possession, and carefully use" the property, until default, and that if the mortgagor shall "make way with, sell, or in any manner dispose of it" the mortgagee shall have the right to the immediate possession, is not void as to the mortgagor's creditors, on the ground that by its terms it was given solely to hinder and delay them. Distinguishing Leopold v. Silverman, 7 Mont. 266, 16 Pac. Rep. 580.

2. An instrument reciting that in consideration of $500 paid and $450 rent due the goods described "are sold and assigned" to the assignee, and that he shall sell them, retain expenses, fees, etc., and the amount due, and shall pay the balance to the assignor, and which is executed and recorded as a mortgage, and is spoken of as such by the parties, will be treated as a chattel mortgage.

3. In an action by the first mortgagee against a subsequent mortgagee of the same goods, who alleges that the first mortgage was given solely to delay and defraud creditors, evidence that the mortgagor was allowed to buy and sell goods after the execution of the first mortgage is inadmissible to show its invalidity on that ground; the question as to the sufficiency of the description of "wines, liquors, and cigars now in and upon said premises" not being raised.

4. Where, in such action, the jury find specially that there was no intent on the part of the first mortgagee to defraud creditors, the mortgage is valid as between him and the mortgagor, and the second mortgagee is not entitled, in any event, to recover more than the amount of his claim.

5. Where the second mortgage recites that it is made in consideration of $950 money paid and rent due, but that the mortgagee may retain out of the proceeds only $450 for cash paid and rent, "besides expenses of sale and fees," and the evidence is conflicting as to the amount due, but shows that in no case was it more than $450, a verdict for $1,850 to the second mortgagee, in case the first mortgagee retains the property, is unsupported by the evidence.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; THOMAS J. GALBRAITH, Judge.

Henry C. Smith, C. B. Nolan, and J. A. Carter, for appellants Shober & Rowe and McConnell & Clayberg, for respondents.

HARWOOD, J. Appeal from judgment and order overruling motion for new trial. This action was brought to recover possession of certain personal property. The plaintiffs were mortgagees of the chattels in controversy, by virtue of a mortgage executed and delivered to them by one Julius Levy, to secure the payment of $4,000, evidenced by a promissory note described in the mortgage. The chattels described are a lot of specific articles, such as "a bar and work-board, back-bar, 5x12 mirror and frame, one bottle case, ice-box, screen, 5x15 mirror, cigar counter and case, two faro-tables, eighteen chairs, 3 chandeliers, 5 hanging lamps, one clock," etc.; the description being specific as to a lot of saloon fixtures, and a certain lot of bedroom furniture, situate in a certain building. This descriptive portion of the mortgage closes with the following words: "Also all the wines, liquors, and cigars now in and upon said premises, of whatsoever kind, character, or description, whether for consumption or otherwise." The mortgage provides that the mortgagor should "have the right to remain in possession and carefully use" said property until default was made under the conditions of the mortgage; and further provides, among other things, that if the mortgagor should "make way with, sell, or in any manner dispose of said described property, or any part thereof, or attempt to do so," then, in any such event, the mortgagee should have the right to the immediate possession of said property. It appears from the evidence that the mortgagor remained in possession of all of the mortgaged property for the period of about one month from the execution and delivery of the mortgage, during which time he carried on the business of buying and selling liquors and cigars, the same as he had before the execution of the mortgage. About a month after the mortgage was given the mortgagor came to the mortgagees, saying he would turn the property over to them, and they "may get out of it the best they could." Thereupon the mortgagees took possession of the property, and put their watchman in possession thereof to watch and take care of the same for them. The property remained at this time in a building owned by defendant Emily Schlesinger, where the mortgagor had been carrying on business. When plaintiffs took possession of said property on the 29th of August, said defendant Emily Schlesinger, by her agent, B. J. Schlesinger, granted, in writing, permission to plaintiffs to store said chattels in said building "free of charge, until September 15, 1888." On the 17th of September, 1888, as appears by the evidence, while plaintiffs' watchman was temporarily absent from said building, the defendant B. J. Schlesinger, as agent for his wife, Emily Schlesinger, took possession of said goods, and put other locks on the doors of said building, and excluded plaintiffs from the possession thereof.

The defense interposed by the defendants' answer was a denial of the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint, and new matter, which may be stated, in effect, as follows: (1) That plaintiffs' mortgage upon said chattels "was made by Julius Levy for the sole purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Al. Owens and Julius Levy," and that defendant Emily Schlesinger was their creditor to the extent of $450 at the time said mortgage was executed. (2) That defendant Al. Owens was a copartner, equal with said Levy, in the ownership of said goods and chattels, and that said mortgage was made to plaintiffs without the consent of said Al. Owens, and for a purpose foreign to said copartnership, and without consideration. (3) That after the execution and delivery of said mortgage plaintiffs "permitted said Owens and Levy, as partners, to openly and notoriously sell and dispose of said mortgaged goods and chattels in the usual course of the saloon business, in the same manner as before the execution of said mortgage. (4) That said goods and chattels were sold and delivered to defendant B. J. Schlesinger, as agent of Emily Schlesinger, by the firm of Levy & Owens, through Al. Owens, one of said firm, on the 17th of September, 1888," as shown by a bill of sale attached to defendants' answer as a part thereof. The instrument attached to defendants' answer recites that "Julius Levy and A. T. Owens, copartners under the firm name and style of Julius Levy, (A. T. Owens being a silent partner,) the lessees, for and in consideration of the sum of five hundred dollars to us in hand paid, and for the further sum of four hundred and fifty dollars, rent due Emily Schlesinger, lessor," the said goods are sold and assigned to said lessor. Said instrument further provides "that said lessor, Emily Schlesinger, her agent or attorney, shall be entitled to take immediate possession of all of said goods and property, and shall take an invoice thereof, and shall sell all of the same to the highest bidder, at private sale or otherwise, and the balance of the proceeds remaining, if there be [any,] over and above the above-named consideration, to-wit, four hundred and fifty dollars, for cash paid and for rent due," and reasonable commission fees, etc., "all of which shall be retained by said lessor, Emily Schlesinger, shall be paid over to the above-named Julius Levy and A. T. Owens, a partnership, as above stated." This instrument is executed by said A. T. Owens with all the solemnities required for the execution of a chattel mortgage, according to the laws of the territory of Montana at the time the same was executed, and was filed for record September 18, 1888. It also appears from the evidence that said instrument was considered by the party of the second part as a mortgage, for her agent said in his testimony that he took possession of said property September 17, 1888, "by virtue of a mortgage for rent due" and he refers to the instrument elsewhere as a mortgage. Al. Owens, who executed said instrument, in his testimony also speaks of it as a mortgage given "for the purpose of securing money for rent." The feature of said instrument which indisputably stamps it with the character of a chattel mortgage is its own condition, that the property transferred shall be sold by the party of the second part, and the proceeds applied by her to the payment of her stated claim, and that the residue should be paid to the firm of Levy & Owens. The instrument will be treated as a chattel mortgage.

There is no question before us relating to the rights, interests, or claims of defendant Al. Owens in respect to the property in controversy.

The first question to be resolved is whether plaintiffs' mortgage was, by its own terms and conditions, fraudulent and void as to creditors, under the doctrine held in

Leopold v. Silverman, 7 Mont. 266, 16 Pac. Rep. 580, as contended by respondents' counsel. It will be seen by comparison that the instruments in question are radically different. The mortgages under consideration in Leopold v. Silverman contained a provision "that the said parties [mortgagors] may continue to sell the said stock of merchandise in the usual course of trade," and notwithstanding that one of the instruments contained a provision to the effect that the mortgagors should account for the proceeds, as often as requested, and "at least once a month," the fact appeared by the pleadings, as the case stood, that the mortgagors retained a portion of the proceeds by the knowledge and consent of the mortgagees. The mortgagors in that case were merchants, and the property mortgaged was "their stock in trade." In the case at bar the main portion of the mortgaged property, so far as the mortgage shows, was a lot of specific articles of furniture, described. What "the wines, liquors, and cigars, now in and upon said premises," was, as to kind, quantity, or value, is not disclosed by the mortgage, nor by any evidence aliunde. There is no power to sell any of the mortgaged goods and chattels provided by the conditions of this mortgage. On the contrary, that act is expressly made a violation of its conditions, as well as the act of "making way with, or in any manner disposing of, said described property." These conditions may be inconsistent with the provisions allowing the mortgagor "to remain in possession of and carefully use" property mentioned in said mortgage, necessarily consumable by the use thereof. But we are not now considering that feature of the instrument. Moreover, inconsistencies in an instrument do not per se vitiate the same. Comp. St. div. 1, §§ 628-638. Nor are we to consider whether said mortgage was void as to any attempt to include merchandise therein, for the reason of uncertainty of description as to that. The question is, shall the mortgage be declared fraudulent and void by reason of its own terms? We think not. The mortgage in the case at bar is not like the mortgages declared void in the case of Leopold v. Silverman, supra, or others of a kindred nature, which have been declared void by reason of their own conditions, in numerous well-considered cases. Pierce, Mortg. Merch., and cases cited.

Closely connected with this branch of the case is the defense wherein defendants allege that, after the execution of the mortgage of plaintiffs, they permitted said Levy & Owens to openly and notoriously sell and dispose of said mortgaged goods and chattels in the usual course of trade. We have already noticed the obscurity and uncertainty of plaintiff's mortgage, as to what was intended to be described by the clause, "all wines, liquors, and cigars now in and upon said premises." Much evidence was introduced tending to show that, after the execution of the mortgage to plaintiffs, the mortgagor continued to buy and sell wines, liquors, etc., in his saloon business, as usual. It appears that the case was tried on the theory that such goods were covered by the mortgage. On no other theory can we account for the introduction of so much evidence as to what merchandise used in the saloon trade was bought and sold by the mortgagor after the execution of said mortgage. Even if said clause was sufficient as descriptive of anything, (a point upon which we express no opinion, because it is not before us on that question) it could not be held that the words, "wines, liquors, and cigars now in and upon said premises," included or covered future purchases and sales of such merchandise. The evidence does not show, if indeed evidence aliunde could be permitted to show, what goods were intended to be covered by said clause, nor that such goods were sold, nor that any specific article included in the mortgage was sold. If the jury arrived at their special or general verdict on this point by a consideration of evidence introduced to show that, after the execution of said mortgage, the maker of it was allowed to buy and sell such merchandise, and for that reason the mortgage was void or voidable, clearly the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

Was the plaintiffs' mortgage shown to be void by the allegation and proof of facts sufficient to support the conclusion that the transaction was consummated by plaintiffs and said Levy, with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the mortgagor? The allegations of the answer upon this point would hardly bear criticism. However, counsel have not directly raised a question as to the sufficiency of such allegations, and we shall therefore only notice them in connection with the specification that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The allegation is that plaintiffs' mortgage was made "by one Julius Levy for the sole purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Al. Owens and Julius Levy." There is no allegation of privity or conspiracy on the part of plaintiffs in the alleged scheme to defraud the creditors of Owens & Levy, nor is there proof of any such fact. Van Sant, Pl. 147; Wait, Fraud. Conv. §§ 141 et seq., 199.

The answer contains an allegation to the effect that plaintiffs' mortgage was made "without consideration," but there is no evidence to support that allegation. The evidence on that point is all against it, and the special findings of the jury are contrary to that averment. The jury found that there was no intention on the part of plaintiffs to commit fraud in obtaining said mortgage, and that they took the same to protect themselves. Another aspect of the case deserves notice. Among the grounds on which appellants ask for a new trial, they specify excessive damages, and that the verdict is against law, as well as insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict. The instrument on which defendant Emily Schlesinger bases her claims to the possession of said property is demonstrated, from its own terms, to be a chattel mortgage for security of her claim against Owens & Levy. If plaintiffs' mortgage was held to be void as against her claim, or subsequent to her mortgage, it does not necessarily follow that plaintiffs' mortgage is not good as between plaintiffs and the mortgagor, (Comp. St. div. 5, §§ 229, 1538;) and on the finding by the jury that there was no intent on the part of plaintiffs to defraud any one in taking said mortgage, and the same not being such an instrument as by its own terms fraud could be imputed to it, does it not follow that, as between plaintiffs and Emily Schlesinger, if her claim on said property was precedent to plaintiffs', (a fact which we in no way decide here,) she was then only entitled to recover from plaintiffs the amount of her claim secured by her mortgage, in the absence of the redelivery of said property? What was the amount of her claim? The mortgage executed to Emily Schlesinger recites that it was made in consideration of $950 money and rent due the party of the second part, yet in the body of that instrument she is authorized to retain out of the proceeds of the property $450, "for cash paid and rent due," besides expenses of sale fees, etc. The evidence introduced in reference to her claim shows still a different amount as due. B. J. Schlesinger, husband and agent, who attended to the interests of Emily Schlesinger, testifies that he took possession of said property "Sept. 17, 1888, by virtue of a mortgage for rent due." Again he says, "The rent was paid up to August;" and again, "There was $225 rent due on the 27th of August; I took possession on the 17th of the next month;" and again, "When I gave him this paper there was only $225 due from Owens & Levy." The paper referred to was the written permission given to plaintiffs by the witness as agent for Emily Schlesinger, on August 29th, allowing said chattels to remain in her building until September 15, "free of charge." Two days later the witness took possession of said goods for his wife, Emily. Another witness on behalf of defendant says her claim for rent was about $450, and that Owens made the mortgage to her to secure this rent. No other claim was proved in her favor, yet the jury returned a verdict in her favor for $1,550 in case redelivery of the property was not made. This was undoubtedly excessive. The jury ought to have found what her claim secured by said property was, and her recovery should not exceed that. The verdict of the jury is not sustained by the evidence, and therefore a new trial ought to be granted.

The record before us in this case has been prepared in a manner so grossly in violation of rules of this court it ought to have been promptly stricken from the files, without consideration beyond an observation of its defects. The documentary evidence is not found in its proper place in the record, but these documents, together with depositions on both sides, are bundled together in a sort of appendix near the close of the statement of the case. The depositions are not reduced from questions and answers to the compactness of narrative, and in one case the questions are found in one document and the answers in another. These exhibits are found with no little inconvenience, in a voluminous record, without proper index, and written on paper which violates the rules of court. It is the duty of appellants' counsel to see that the record is properly made. This record has only been tolerated by reason of our unwillingness to impose the expenses of preparing the record anew upon litigants. But hereafter these irregularities will be corrected by striking such records from the files of the court. The judgment and the order overruling appellants' motion for a new trial are hereby reversed, and the cause remanded for trial de novo.

LABORER'S WAGES—ATTACHMENT—PREFERENCES.

Under Gen. Laws Mont. c. 121, § 2050, providing that, in all assignments for benefit of creditors, the wages of laborers, clerks, etc., for services rendered within 60 days previous to the assignment, not to exceed $200 to each person, shall be preferred, a laborer whose employer is attached, and then transfers his property directly to the creditor in payment of the debt, is entitled to a preference out of the goods thus transferred.

Appeal from district court, Jefferson county; THOMAS J. GALBRAITH, Judge.

This action was brought for the purpose of obtaining relief under the provision of chapter 121, Gen. Laws, the act for the protection of wage-workers, the first section of which is as follows: "Sec. 2050. That in all assignments of property made by any person, association, corporation, copartnership, chartered company, or corporation, to trustees or assignees on account of inability of assignor at the time of the assignment to pay his or their debts, or in proceedings in insolvency, the wages of the miners, mechanics, salesmen, servants, clerks, or laborers employed by such assignor for services rendered within sixty days immediately previous to such assignment, not to exceed two hundred dollars to each person, are preferred claims, and must be paid by such trustees or assignees before any other creditor or creditors of such assignor." The complaint sets forth the following facts: Plaintiff is a laborer. On March 3, 1890, one Johnston owed plaintiff $92.85 for labor performed within 40 days of said date. That on March 3, 1890, defendants sued Johnston for $1,609.85, and upon a writ of attachment in said suit the sheriff of the county levied upon all the goods and chattels of Johnston. On March 5, 1890, defendants herein, plaintiffs therein, took a bill of sale of all Johnston's said property to secure their said claim of $1,609.85, for which amount they had commenced said action. At the time of receiving said bill of sale the defendants herein dismissed the suit against Johnston. That the goods so assigned were of the value of $2,220. On March 8, 1890, plaintiff served upon Johnston and defendants an affidavit, setting forth the fact and the nature of the indebtedness of Johnston to plaintiff. That at all the times mentioned Johnston was insolvent and unable to pay his debts. That Johnston or defendants have not paid plaintiff any of said sum. Plaintiff demands judgment for $92.85, interest and costs, and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable. A demurrer was filed on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, no further appearance was made by the defendants, and judgment was entered for plaintiff on his application. It appears from the judgment that it was adjudged and decreed as follows: That plaintiff's claim of $92.85 be paid by the defendants out of the chattels, etc., obtained by defendants from Johnston, with interest since April 1, 1890, and, it appearing that there is sufficient property therefor, it is adjudged that plaintiff have judgment for his claim, etc., against defendants.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) We readily arrive at a conclusion in this case by comparing the allegations of the complaint with the provisions of the statute. Plaintiff was a laborer, having performed services of less than $200 in value, within 60 days immediately previous to the transfer of property by Johnston to defendants. Johnston was insolvent, and unable to pay his debts. It was for this reason, as we believe it appears from the complaint, that he transferred his property to the defendants. He was indebted; he did not pay; he could not pay. His property was attached for debt, and when this occurred he made the transfer to the defendants. No other reason for the transfer appears, and we are of opinion that the common understanding of language, as used in this complaint, makes it certain that Johnston transferred his property by reason of his inability to pay his debts. So far the complaint seems to state a cause of action under the statute. But defendants object that the transfer was not to the defendants as trustees, or for the benefit of creditors, but was in payment of a debt due from Johnston to defendants. Surely the defendants were assignees of Johnston, and equally certain is it that the assignment was made for their benefit as creditors. To say that the wage-workers' law should not operate, because the assignment is made to a creditor directly, and for his sole benefit, instead of being made to a third disinterested person, and for the benefit of more than one creditor, would be to fritter away the law in unsubstantial verbal criticism. We are of opinion that the demurrer was properly overruled. No further appearance being made by defendants, the form and substance of the judgment was such as should have been entered under the statute and the facts before the court. The judgment is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. MURPHY v. JUDGE OF SECOND DISTRICT COURT.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 12, 1891.)

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL ADMINISTRATOR.

Under Prob. Prac. Act Mont. § 95, providing that the court may appoint a special administrator in certain cases, or may direct the public administrator to take charge of the estate, the court may appoint another than the public administrator, and in so doing is not required to follow the order of priority prescribed in section 55 so far as the public administrator is concerned.

Certiorari to district court. Silver Bow county; JOHN J. McHOLTON, Judge.

James W. Murphy, upon a writ of certiorari, asks this court to review the action of the district court in appointing James A. Talbot a special administrator of the estate of Andrew J. Davis, deceased, and not appointing the relator. The facts material to the inquiry, and the statutes necessary to be construed, are as follows: Andrew J. Davis died in the county of Silver Bow, March 11, 1890, leaving a large estate, and a large number of heirs. Afterwards John A. Davis, a brother of deceased, was appointed by the court having jurisdiction administrator of the estate, as that of an intestate. An appeal was taken from that appointment, and on the 24th day of July, 1890, that appeal was pending in the supreme court. On that day, July 24, 1890, said John A. Davis filed in the district court his petition for the probate of an instrument, purporting to be a will of said Andrew J. Davis, and for the appointment of himself as administrator with the will annexed. Objections were filed by some of the heirs to the probate of the alleged will. On August 9, 1890, the appeal to the supreme court above mentioned had not been determined, and the petition for the probate of the alleged will had not been heard in the district court. On the last-mentioned day the said John A. Davis filed in the district court his petition to be appointed special administrator of said estate. The petition set forth the above-recited facts, and, in addition, that the hearing of the petition for the probate of the alleged will had been set for August 23, 1890; that four parties had filed objections to the probate, alleging that the same was not the will of said Andrew J. Davis; that it was evident that much time must elapse before the question of the probate of the alleged will could be determined, and that thereby there would be delay in granting letters of administration; that there was then no one authorized to take charge of the property of the estate, or attend to its business; that petitioner was the brother of deceased, and residuary legatee in said will. On the same day, August 9, 1890, James W. Murphy filed his petition for appointment as special administrator. He set forth that he was public administrator of Silver Bow county, and also, in effect, the facts above recited; that the estate would be wasted and scattered; and prayed that he might be appointed special administrator. The district court acted upon these petitions on August 12, 1890. Prior to said day no written objections had been filed by either petitioner against the appointment of the other, except as his own petition might be construed as an objection to the appointment of the other applicant. On said last-named day the district court made an order in which it reviewed the facts, and concluded that the court, having considered said petitions, and all matters alleged therein, and being advised in the premises, and finding that it is necessary that a special administrator of said estate should be appointed, and finding it to be to the best interests of the estate that neither of said petitioners should be appointed special administrator, denied each of their applications, and, upon its own motion, ordered that James A. Talbot, a suitable and competent person, and a resident of Silver Bow county, Mont., be, and is hereby, appointed special administrator, with powers, etc., and that letters shall issue to him, upon his giving bonds in the sum of $3,000,000. In pursuance to said order, letters issued to said Talbot on August 18, 1890. Such appear to be the facts upon the return of the writ of certiorari issued on the application of said Murphy from this court October 24, 1890.

The statutes of the state interesting to this inquiry are as follows: "Sec. 821. There shall be elected in each county in the state one public administrator, whose term of office shall begin. * * * and who shall hold his office for two years." Comp. St. p. 863. "Sec. 333. Every public administrator, duly elected and qualified, must take charge of the estates of persons dying within his county, as follows: First. Of the estates of decedents for which no administrators are appointed, and which, in consequence thereof, are being wasted, uncared for, or lost; second, of the estates of decedents who leave no known heirs, or are strangers; third, of estates ordered into his hands by the probate court; fourth, of estates upon which letters of administration have been issued to him by the probate court." Comp. St. p. 357. "Sec. 334. Whenever a public administrator takes charge of an estate which he is entitled to administer, without letters of administration being issued, or under order of the court, he must, with all convenient dispatch, procure letters of administration thereon, in a like manner and on like proceedings as letters of administration are issued to other persons." Id. "Sec. 95. When there is delay in granting letters testamentary, or of administration, from any cause, or when such letters are granted irregularly, or no sufficient bond is filed as required, or when no application is made for such letters, or when an administrator or executor dies or is suspended or removed, the probate judge must appoint a special administrator to collect and take charge of the estate of the decedent, in whatever county or counties the same may be found, and to exercise such powers as may be necessary for the preservation of the estate, or he may direct the public administrator of his county to take charge of the estate. Sec. 96. The appointment may be made out of term-time and without notice, and must be made by entry on the minutes of the court specifying the powers to be exercised by the administrator. * * * Sec. 97. In making the appointment of a special administrator, the probate judge must give preference to the person entitled to letters testamentary or of administration, but no appeal must be allowed from the appointment." Last three sections from Comp. St. p. 296. "Sec. 55. Letters of administration on the estate of a person dying intestate must be granted to some one or more of the persons hereinafter mentioned, who are respectively entitled thereto, in the following order: First, the surviving husband or wife; * * * second, the children; third, the father and mother; fourth, the brothers; fifth, the sisters; sixth, the grandchildren; seventh, the next of kin entitled to share in the distribution of the estate; eighth, the public administrator; ninth, the creditors; tenth, any person legally competent. Id. p. 289. As to the writ of certiorari, the law is: "Sec. 554. The writ of certiorari may be denominated the 'writ of review.' Sec. 555. * * * The writ shall be granted in all cases when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. Sec. 556. The application shall be made on affidavit by the party beneficially interested. * * * Sec. 561. The review upon this writ shall not be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board, or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board, or officer. Sec. 562. * * * When a full return has been made, the court * * * may give judgment either affirming or annulling or modifying the proceedings below." Chapter 1, p. 205, Comp. St. The statutes above cited were enacted by the territorial legislature. The constitution of the state, November 8, 1889, adopted these statutes, and merged the jurisdiction and existence of the probate court in the district court, and provided for the change of the word "probate" to "district" wherever it occurs. Section 20, Schedule, § 4. In the affidavit for the writ of certiorari the applicant prays that this court review the said proceedings of the district judge, alleging that they were in excess of the jurisdiction of that court. The action of this court is limited to annulling or affirming the proceedings of the district judge, so far as they come before us.

E. D. Weed and John M. McDonald, for petitioner. M. Kirkpatrick, for respondent.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Much has been brought into this case in the argument that is not pertinent to the hearing. The application is for a writ of certiorari. The general principles of law applicable to the invocation of this writ are the same throughout all the courts; but any doubts as to the province of the writ in this court, and any minor differences in the views of courts upon the writ generally, are fully set at rest by the explicit provisions of the statute of this state. Under that statute, we have only to inquire whether the application is properly before us, and, if so, whether the district judge exceeded his jurisdiction.

tion 95, which seems to us as clear as it is conclusive. The public administrator, when acting solely as such, is, perhaps, a public officer. His powers and duties are defined, and the estates of which he shall take charge are described. Section 821, p. 863, Comp. St.; section 333, p. 357, Id. When there is a delay in appointing an administrator, the district judge, for the temporary protection of the estate, may do one of two things, (section 95:) (1) He may direct the public administrator to take charge of the estate, or, (2) if he does not so direct, he must appoint a special administrator. There seems to be no ambiguity in this provision. A discretion is given to the district judge to adopt one of two courses. In the case at bar the judge exercised this discretion, and exercised it by not directing the public administrator to take charge of the estate. The judge took the other alternative of the statute, and proceeded to the appointment of a special administrator. He thereby did something wholly inconsistent with directing the public administrator to take charge of the estate, and thereby as well passed upon and decided the question of directing the public administrator to take charge, and decided it adversely to such taking charge by the public administrator. This was an act of judicial discretion, of which no abuse is shown, and of which the public administrator cannot complain. Having passed and settled this matter, and proceeding to the other alternative allowed the judge, under section 95, viz., the appointment of a special administrator, which the judge could do without notice to any one, and out of term-time, (section 96,) the judge finds that section 97 provides that preference must be given in such appointment to the persons entitled to general administratorship, in the order named in section 55. In that order, the public administrator appears as eighth. But the law has already provided, in the other alternative in section 95, that the public administrator, as to temporary care of the estate, stands ahead of all classes of persons named in section 55, if the judge chooses to put the estate into his hands. A special provision is thus made for putting the public administrator in charge: a special provision, which takes him out of the general classes of administrators. If it is the judgment of the judge that the public administrator should take the estate, the judge may so direct, to the exclusion of all claimants to special letters. Now, when the judge passes the public administrator, and practically says, "I will not appoint him, as I may," and determines to proceed under the other alternative of section 95, and appoint a special administrator, then, in making his selection from the classes of persons named in section 55, must he again adjudicate upon the claims of the public administrator, a question which he has already decided under an ampler provision of the law allowing him to give to him the estate? Must he again say whether or not he will give him charge of the estate, when he has already settled the matter in the exercise of his discretion, and said he would not do so? We think not. The judge had the amplest and largest powers to direct the estate into the hands of the public administrator, to the exclusion of every one. He did not exercise that power. It cannot be said that, the judge having deliberately ignored the public administrator, when he had full power to recognize him, he must again consider his claim, when proceeding under the other alternative of the statute. This would be equivalent to holding that the judge may, if he chooses, make the public administrator the temporary custodian of the estate, but, if he does not do so, as he may, then, in appointing a special administrator, he must, under certain conditions, do the very thing which the other provision of the law says he may do, and which, in his discretion, he has decided not to do. We cannot agree to any such construction of the statute. It would be a strain upon language, approaching the point of fracture. The correct view of sections 95, 97, and 55 is that the public administrator is not in the list of candidates for special administratorship, for the reason that his claims for temporary custodianship of the estate are provided for in another separate portion of the section, by which he is first placed in choice, if the judge desires him to take charge. Our interpretation of these laws is that, when there is delay in the appointment of an administrator, the judge may direct the public administrator to take charge of the estate. If he does not do so, which he need not, then the public administrator is disposed of in the premises, and the judge must go on to appoint a special administrator, from the classes of persons named in section 55, other than the public administrator. Now, the public administrator invokes the writ of certiorari on the ground that the district judge exceeded his jurisdiction. Under our construction of the statutes, we are of the opinion that the district judge, as far as the relator is concerned in the proceedings, did not exceed his jurisdiction; and the writ is therefore dismissed.

STATE v. FRY.

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF NOTICE.

Under Crim. Prac. Act Mont. § 856, providing that applications for a new trial, if made for any cause mentioned in the first four subdivisions of section 354, shall be based on affidavits filed at the same time as the notice of motion, and that in all other cases the notice must state particularly the error relied upon, a notice of motion entered upon the motion book, and service of which is admitted by the county attorney, stating that as soon as a transcript of the evidence is made defendant will move for a new trial on grounds to be set forth in the motion, is insufficient.

Appeal from district court, Deer Lodge county; D. M. DUFFEE, Judge.

John Duffy, for appellants. Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BLAKE, C. J. The appellant was convicted September 19, 1890, of the crime of robbery, and judgment was pronounced October 18, 1890. The following notice was made and entered September 19, 1890, in the motion book of the court below: "To W. S. Shaw, County Attorney: You will hereby take notice that the above-named defendant will, as soon as the transcript of the evidence in the above case is made, move the court for a new trial of the above cause, upon the grounds to be set forth in said motion. J. H. DUFFY, Att'y for Defendant. Dated Sept. 19th, 1890. Service of above notice admitted, and copy waived. W. S. SHAW, County Attorney. Sept. 19th, 1890." The appellant did not file an affidavit or make a statement of facts which called for a special order of the court, or apply for further time for the preparation of any papers. The record is silent upon this matter, and we can presume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that "the transcript of the evidence" was furnished as soon as it was demanded. We cannot discover any good cause for the conduct of counsel in departing from the procedure which governs and defines the rights of parties who have been convicted of an offense against the laws of the state. The motion for a new trial, which was served and filed October 1, 1890, specified every error that was relied on by the appellant. This motion was overruled by the court on the "ground that no notice had been served." No brief has been filed by the appellant. The criminal practice act provides as follows: "The application for a new trial shall be made upon motion, and, if based upon any of the grounds mentioned in the first four subdivisions of the preceding section, written notice of such motion must be filed within thirty days after the discovery of the facts upon which the party relies in support of his motion; in all other cases notice of motion must be filed within ten days after the rendition of the verdict." Section 355. "Applications for a new trial, if made for any of the causes mentioned in the first four subdivisions of section 354 of this division, shall be based upon affidavits, which must be filed at the same time as the notice of motion, or within such further time as may be allowed by the court or judge; in all other cases, the application must be made, * * * and the notice of motion must state particularly the error upon which the party making the application relies." Section 356. There are seven subdivisions of said section 354, which state the grounds for which a new trial will be granted in criminal actions. It will be observed that the notice of the motion must be filed within a certain number of days, which varies according to the causes on which they are based. The Code of Civil Procedure relating to motions contains this clause: "Notice of a motion made in term-time, except those made during the progress of a trial, shall be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, and called the 'Motion Book'; and such motion shall be for hearing after twenty-four hours from the time such notice is entered in the motion book." Section 483. The criminal practice act provides further: "An application for a new trial shall be heard on the second day after notice filed, or as soon as practicable thereafter."

Section 356. The Code of Civil Procedure in another chapter regulates the mode of obtaining a new trial in civil cases, and requires the party intending to move therefor to file a notice of his intention in a certain form. Title 8, c. 10. The motion book is not used for any purpose in the proceedings which are applicable to new trials, and the appellant did not protect his right to the remedy he desired by the record of his notice. The service of the same was admitted by the county attorney. The statutes have designated the acts which are essential to the notice of the intention to move for a new trial. The court in Burton v. Todd, 68 Cal. 485, 9 Pac. Rep. 663, has said: "We conclude, therefore, (1) that, as the right to move for a new trial is statutory, it must be pursued in the manner pointed out by the statute." The appellant could not lawfully embody in his motion for a new trial the particulars which should be stated in his notice of intention. The appellant has not filed or served a proper notice of his intention to move for a new trial, and the judgment is affirmed, and will be executed as directed in the court below.

PALMER V. MCMASTER.

LIABILITY OF SHERIFF—ILLEGAL SEIZURE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against a sheriff for the conversion of personal property, where the defendant justifies under an execution against the property of a third person, alleging him to be the real owner, it is not error to exclude the execution unless defendant proves or offers to prove the existence of a valid judgment upon which the execution issued.

2. Where the judgment upon which the execution issues is void it is not error to reject an amendment to the answer alleging more fully the indebtedness upon which the original action was brought, and setting forth the petition and writ of attachment, as the lien of the attachment merges in the judgment.

3. An offer of depositions "for the purpose of proving that the property in controversy is not the property of plaintiff, and that she was not in possession thereof," is properly excluded on the ground of vagueness, where the portions of the depositions which it is desired to introduce are not designated.

4. In an action for conversion of property, where the plaintiff's ownership and possession are in issue, it is error to instruct that the "only question" is the value of the property, although plaintiff's testimony as to her ownership is undisputed.

Appeal from district court, Deer Lodge county; D. M. DUFFEE, Judge.

Cole & Whitehill, for respondent.

BLAKE, C. J. This is the second appeal which has been before the court. The facts, which are recited in the reports, (8 Mont. 186, 19 Pac. Rep. 585,) will not be repeated in this opinion. At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the sum of $2,068, and judgment was entered for the respondent for this amount. The motion of the appellant for a new trial was overruled.

We have deliberated upon all the questions which have been presented for adjustment, and arrived at the conclusion that the instructions were conflicting and misleading. As there must be a new trial of the case, we will review all the questions which must be determined at that time in the court below. The executions which are mentioned in the report of the case, supra, were offered in evidence by the appellant. They were regular upon their face, and one of them stated that James M. Bailey recovered April 22, 1884, in the district court, a judgment against William J. Palmer for the sum of $645 damages and $277.30, costs. The sheriff made this return thereon:

"I do hereby certify that I received the annexed execution on the 23d day of April, A. D. 1884, and executed same by levying upon and selling on the 3d day of May, A. D. 1884, the following described property, to-wit: [description of property in controversy.] Exhibit:

Amount of judgment.....	$922 30
Accruing costs.....	33 14
	<hr/> $955 44

Amount received from sale.....	$907 00
To deficiency.....	48 44"

The bill of exceptions states that this evidence was excluded by the court "for the reason that defendant did not offer to prove any valid judgment upon which said execution was issued, and without such judgment defendant could not justify." Upon the first appeal it was held that the judgments which were entered in favor of said Bailey and Albert Kleinschmidt and against the said W. J. Palmer, and for the enforcement of which said executions were issued, "were void, and of no effect." 8 Mont. 194, 19 Pac. Rep. 585. Under the decisions of this court, the ruling complained of was correct. Ford v. McMaster, 6 Mont. 240, 11 Pac. Rep. 669; Marcum v. Coleman, 8 Mont. 196, 19 Pac. Rep. 394. It also appears in the transcript that "the defendant asked leave to amend his answer, setting up more fully the indebtedness on which James M. Bailey and Kleinschmidt & Co. instituted the suits in which the attachments were issued against said W. J. Palmer, in which said property was taken by defendant, and the complaint, affidavit, and undertaking for attachment therein, and the attachments issued in said actions, as a justification to him for taking said property." The court refused to allow this amendment to be made, and would not permit the testimony tending to prove the averments thereof to be introduced. The writs of attachment in the actions referred to were issued to authorize the officer to levy upon and hold said property as a security for the satisfaction of any judgment which might be recovered by the plaintiffs. When the sheriff sold and delivered the same under the foregoing execution, and accounted for the proceeds thereof, the possession and lien which were acquired by virtue of the proceedings in attachment were lost. This property was disposed of without any valid process, and under these conditions the officer is deemed a trespasser ab initio. The writs of attachment in the actions pending against

W. J. Palmer possess no vitality. In Ross v. Philbrick, 39 Me. 29, this statement appears in the facts: "The counsel for defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that, as the property sued for was lawfully attached by Burnham, and that suit still pending in court, the plaintiff can maintain no action to recover the value of that property while so pending, on account of defendant's having sold the same, although the sale was not conformable to the statute." The court, by Mr. Justice CUTTING, said: "Here, then, was an abuse of authority, and the defendant, according to the rule, was a trespasser ab initio. * * * But it is contended that, so long as the process upon which the property in controversy was attached is pending in court, the plaintiff cannot sustain this action. * * * An officer who has been guilty of a trespass from the beginning cannot invoke to his aid the process which he has abused. He places himself in the same situation he would have occupied had he seized the property without any process, and taken it from the owner's possession; and what consequence is it to the officer or the attaching creditor that the suit is pending when the attachment is dissolved, and can no longer be made available to satisfy a subsequent execution?" Drake, Attachm. (6th Ed.) § 291; Zschocke v. People, 62 Ill. 127. There was no error in the action of the court upon the amendment which was proposed to the answer, or the evidence thereunder. The testimony of the respondent was direct and positive that she owned the property in controversy, and that the horses were at her place on Warm Springs creek when the sheriff sold them. She was not cross-examined. Two witnesses testified, in effect, that the horses were "with Mrs. Palmer on her ranch," and in her custody. This evidence was uncontradicted, and admitted without any objection or exception upon the part of the appellant. The issue of ownership could not arise upon this trial, because this court laid down the law of the case, and said: "It is no concern of theirs [the creditors] who owns the property; for, unless they have valid judgments to support their executions, they cannot deprive the plaintiff of her possession." 8 Mont. 195, 19 Pac. Rep. 589. The appellant made several offers to prove matters relating to the question of actual possession at the time of the alleged conversion. When they are examined it is evident that the rules which govern this practice have not been followed. In Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 75, the court said: "But when counsel make an 'offer' of evidence it must appear that the facts offered to be proven, in connection with facts as to which evidence has already been taken, are relevant; otherwise the court is justified in sustaining an objection to the offer. The offer must be complete in itself, and must not omit facts, without which the facts offered are not relevant." Smith v. Mining Co., 54 Cal. 164; Schroeder v. Schmidt, 74 Cal. 459, 16 Pac. Rep. 243. For an illustration of these views we will refer to the transcript, which says: "The defendant offered in evidence the depositions of John Cartin and Albert Mead

* * * for the purpose of proving, and by which testimony he would be able to prove, that the property set out in plaintiff's complaint was not the property of plaintiff, and that she did not own the same, and was not in the possession thereof." This offer does not embrace one specific fact, and the court was required to ignore it upon the ground of vagueness. The depositions are not in the record, but the appellant did not designate the portions of the testimony which he wished to introduce. This right to show that the respondent did not enjoy the possession of the property at the time complained of was not denied by the court, but his offers of proof thereon were ambiguous, and fatally defective. The first instruction covered the issue concerning the value of the property, and the following is a part thereof: "You are instructed that the only question for you to consider in this case is the value of the animals mentioned in the complaint. You are the sole judges of such value, which must be arrived at by you from the evidence given by the witnesses. It is admitted by the defendant in his answer that the value of such animals was at the time of their conversion $907, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover such sum,—not less than $907, and not more than $2,100,—as you may think her entitled to under the evidence." The fifth instruction is as follows: "The jury are instructed that before the plaintiff in this case can recover she must prove that at the time said property described in the complaint herein was taken and levied upon by the defendant, James B. McMaster, she was in possession thereof, and that said property was taken from her; but, if the plaintiff has failed to prove that at the time defendant took said property she was [not] the owner of it, or in the possession thereof, then the jury should find for the defendant." The jury were instructed that the sole question for their consideration related to the value of the property, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover a sum, which could not be less than $907, nor more than $2,100. The jury were also told that there were other issues to be determined, and that the plaintiff must prove that at a certain time she was in the possession of the property, and that the same was taken from her. The instructions were given upon material points, and were conflicting. It has been observed that the testimony of the respondent upon the issue of possession was not rebutted by the appellant, but the court should not have assumed in its charge that the facts were proven, which the evidence tended to establish. This proposition was controverted by the appellant, and never conceded. The fifth instruction was correct, and applicable to the evidence; and the jury could not find a verdict for the plaintiff in any amount unless they were satisfied that she was in the possession of said property when it was converted by the defendant. When this conclusion was reached, it was proper to inquire into and fix the value of the horses; and the court erred in instructing the jury without any qualification that the plaintiff was rightfully entitled to recover a sum ranging between two amounts, which were specified. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment be reversed, with costs; that the order overruling the motion for a new trial be set aside; and that the cause be remanded for a new trial.

COUNTIES—BOUNDARIES—POWERS OF TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE—TAXATION.

1. Act Cong. May 26, 1864, creating the territory of Montana, and defining its boundaries, excluded therefrom territory which, by Indian treaties, was not to be included within the jurisdiction of any state or territory. Afterwards a treaty was made with the Crow Indians, by which a reservation was set apart to them. Held that, as the treaty was silent on the question of the inclusion of the reservation within the boundaries of Montana, the Crow reservation became a part of the territory, and subject to the control of the territorial legislature, so far as the division of the territory into counties is concerned.

2. By treaty of Aug. 23, 1881, the Crow Indians ceded to the United States a strip of their land, 400 feet wide, along and parallel with the southern bank of the Yellowstone river, and used by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for a right of way. This strip was subsequently granted by the United States to the railroad company, and formed a part of Custer county, as originally created by Act Mont. Feb. 2, 1865. Subsequently, by Act Mont. Feb. 26, 1883, the north-western part of Custer county was set apart as the county of Yellowstone, the southern boundary of which is the center of the channel of the Yellowstone river; thus leaving the railroad company's right of way within the limits of Custer county. Held, that Act Mont. March 5, 1885, which attached such right of way to the county of Yellowstone "for judicial purposes," did not confer, on that county, the right to tax it, as that is an executive, and not a judicial, power.

Appeal from district court, Yellowstone county; GEORGE R. MILBURN, Judge.

Jas. R. Goss and Toole & Wallace, for appellants. Strevell & Porter, for respondent.

DE WITT, J. This action was originally against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for taxes; but the county of Custer was interpleaded, and the contention is now between the two counties, as to the right to collect the tax from the company. The railroad company is a disinterested party, and has paid the money into court, to await the decision of this case. It is not necessary, to an intelligent view of the case, to review the pleadings. The case is properly before this court. The tax in question, $1,531.25, was levied by each county upon the property of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, situated upon a strip of land, the right of way of the company, 400 feet wide, and extending westwardly from the crossing of the railroad over the Big Horn river to the crossing over the Yellowstone river, near the town of Billings; which is land ceded by the Crow Indians, from their reservation, to the United States, and by the latter granted to the railroad company for right-of-way purposes. The geographical position and relation of this strip of land to the two counties and the Crow Indian reservation is made clear by the accompanying plat:

The only question before the court is as to what county has jurisdiction to tax the property within this strip. The district court decided in favor of Custer county, from which judgment Yellowstone county appeals. This controversy arose in the year 1889, under the territorial government of Montana. It is necessary to give a short historical review. The act of congress creating the territory (May 26, 1864) included within its boundaries the whole of what is now the Crow Indian reservation, and the counties of Custer and Yellowstone, and the strip of land in question. As to Indians, that act provided "that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with any Indian tribe, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the territory of Montana, until such tribe shall signify their assent to the president of the United States to be included within said territory." 13 U. S. St. at Large, p. 86, § 1. In examining the relations of the Crow Indians and the United States government, we find that on May 26, 1864, the date of said act, there was not within the limits of the territory of Montana, so created, any land as to which it had been provided, by treaty with the Crow Indians, that it should not be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory. The treaty with the Crows of February 6, 1826, is one only of amity and commerce. In it no land in the United States is set apart for their use and occupation. No land within the limits of what became the territory of Montana is so set apart for them until the treaty of May 7, 1868, which was subsequent to the act of congress of May 26, 1864, from which we have above quoted a portion of section 1. This latter treaty "set apart, for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation" of the Crow Indians, a tract of land bounded on the east by the one hundred and seventh meridian, on the south by the forty-fifth degree of latitude, which was the southern boundary of Montana, on the north by the mid-channel of the Yellowstone river, and on the west by a line west of the strip of ground in controversy in this action. This whole area was within the then organized territory of Montana, and included within itself this strip of land, which afterwards became the right of way of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. This latter treaty of May 7, 1868, being subsequent to the act organizing the territory of Montana, and defining the limits thereof, and placing this area in question within those limits, and the treaty of May 7, 1868, being absolutely silent on the question of any rights or claims of the Crow Indians to have or not to have their reservation included within the boundaries of said territory theretofore organized as above described, we conclude that the territory of the Crow reservation became, and was, and is a part of Montana.

The territorial government, thus having within its boundaries a vast area, proceeded to divide it into counties. It created the counties of Missoula, Deer Lodge, Beaverhead, Madison, Jefferson, Edgerton, (afterwards Lewis and Clarke,) Gallatin, and Choteau. Act February 2, 1865, (Sess. Laws, 1864-65, p. 528.) This act specifically defined the limits of each of said counties by mountain ranges, rivers, and other natural objects, and meridians of longitude and degrees of latitude. These lines left wholly without the limits of said defined counties a great district in the eastern part of the territory, as to which country the act provided (section 9) as follows: "That all the remaining portion of the territory of Montana, not included in the counties before named in this act, be, and the same is hereby, created a county, to be known as 'Big Horn County,' and shall be attached for legislative and judicial purposes to the county of Gallatin." This residuum of territory, created as and called "Big Horn County," included what is now the counties of Custer and Yellowstone and the Crow Indian reservation. For the purposes of this review, the situation remained the same in Codified St. 1871-72, p. 432. By act of February 16, 1877, (10th Sess.) p. 425, the legislature changed the name of Big Horn county to Custer county, in honor of the gallant soldier who had just fallen in defense of her people. In February, 1879, by an act which became a law without the governor's approval, (11th Sess. p. 100,) courts were created, and the county-seat named "Miles," (not "Miles City,") in honor of another soldier distinguished in her history. The strip of land was still within Custer county, and remained so, when the act of February 26, 1883, (Comp. St. p. 839, § 742,) created the county of Yellowstone partly from what has been Custer county. It is sufficient to say of its boundaries that the southerly one was "the center of the channel of the Yellowstone river." The strip of land now in question lies wholly south of the Yellowstone river, and parallel, or nearly so, to the said southerly boundary of Yellowstone county, created as above described. Let it be remembered that the northerly boundary of the Crow Indian reservation was the mid-channel of the Yellowstone river. On March 5, 1885, (Comp. St. p. 840,) the following amendment to the above act was passed: "That all that portion of the Crow Indian reservation lying between the Wyoming line and the Yellowstone river, and west of the Big Horn river, in Montana territory, that may hereafter be segregated and thrown open to settlement, shall form a part of Yellowstone county. All that portion of the Crow Indian reservation above described is hereby attached to Yellowstone county for judicial purposes." In this whole history of Yellowstone and Custer counties, the parties to this action, we can find no act of the legislature which took any of this country south of the Yellowstone river out of Custer county, or placed it in Yellowstone county, unless such intent can be construed out of the amendment last mentioned. To this we will return later.

We turn aside to observe the extinguishment of the Crow Indian title to the strip of land under discussion. On August 22, 1881, (22 U. S. St. at Large, p. 157,) by treaty between the Crow Indians and the United States, the former ceded to the latter "a strip of land, not exceeding four hundred feet in width,—that is to say, two hundred feet on each side of the line laid down on the map of definite location hereinbefore mentioned, (the Northern Pacific Railroad line,)—wherever said line runs through said reservation between the 107th degree of longitude west of Greenwich on the east, and the mid-channel of the Big Boulder river on the west, containing five thousand three hundred and eighty-four acres, more or less." This western boundary at the Big Boulder river is west of the western boundary of the strip in question, at the crossing of the Yellowstone river near the town of Billings, hereinbefore described. By act of congress of July 10, 1882, right of way, for railroad purposes, over this strip of land, was granted by the United States to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the original defendant in this action, before the interpleader of the county of Custer. Thus the Indian title was extinguished, and the land belongs to the county of Custer or the county of Yellowstone; or, rather, which county has the right of taxation upon said strip? is the question presented to this court.

This narrow ribbon of territory is certainly a portion of the county of Custer. It was, as has been seen, first placed within Custer county, and has never been taken out. This seems beyond controversy. It is equally clear that Custer county has the exclusive right to tax the property of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon said land, unless the amendatory act of March 5, 1885, (Comp. St. p. 840,) confers that right upon Yellowstone county. The only argument for this position that we have discovered is that this territory is attached to Yellowstone county for judicial purposes. What are "judicial purposes?" Webster's Dictionary defines the word "judicial" as "pertaining or appropriate to courts of justice, or to a judge thereof; as, judicial power; a judicial mind. Practiced or employed in the administration of justice; as, judicial proceedings. Proceeding from a court of justice; as, a judicial determination; ordered by a court, as a judicial sale." The Century Dictionary, the most thorough English lexicon of which we have any knowledge, devotes a large space to the definition of the word "judicial." Among other things it says: "Of or belonging to a court of justice; of or pertaining to a judge; pertaining to the administration of justice; proper to a court of law; consisting of or resulting from legal inquiry or judgment, as judicial power or proceedings; a judicial decision, writ, sale, or punishment; determinative; giving judgment. Judicial act, an act involving the exercise of judicial power." This excellent work defines the word "judicial" in connection with many words and expressions with which it is used, and invariably in the sense above indicated. It refers to the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, in which Justice FIELD says, (page 761:) "The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of parties are, with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. Whenever an act undertakes to determine a question of right or obligation, or of property, as the foundation upon which it proceeds, such act is to that extent a judicial one." Bouvier's Law Dictionary does not define the adjective "judicial" separately, but treats of it used in connection with a dozen other words, and the whole tenor of definition is so completely in line with what we have already quoted that it is useless to cite further. We cannot doubt, in view of the meaning of the word "judicial," that the expression "judicial purposes," as used in the statute which we are endeavoring to construe, means purposes of the courts and the administration of justice. Taxation certainly does not pertain to the affairs of courts and the administration of justice. Judicial, legislative, and executive affairs are very distinctly separated throughout the whole history and policy of American law and government. Their provinces are well defined, and their boundaries sharply drawn. The legislature must have had this in mind when they attached the old county of Big Horn to Gallatin county "for legislative and judicial purposes." Codified St. 1871-72, p. 432, § 11. Thus legislative and judicial purposes are expressed, and executive purposes are excluded. Thirteen years later, (Act March 5, 1885,) when we come to the attachment of this portion of the Crow Indian reservation to Yellowstone county, judicial purposes alone are expressed, and both legislative and executive are excluded. There seems here to be an application of the maxim, expressio unius, exclusio alterius. If the legislature had intended to include executive purposes, revenue, and taxation, they would have so expressed themselves. Their silence is significant. The use of the word "judicial," in other portions of the laws of Montana, indicate its meaning. Section 531, Code Civil Proc., provides that no judicial business shall be done on Sunday, etc., except; and then goes on to recite a large number of acts and classes of business which pertain solely to courts, and the affairs of courts. Sections 698, 699, Code Civil Proc., defines judicial districts, and then treats of the courts therein. Again, observe that the act of March 5, 1885, provides that portions of the Crow reservation, which shall hereafter be segregated and thrown open for settlement, shall form a part of Yellowstone county. But this strip of land in question had been segregated three years prior to this act. If the legislature intended to place this strip in Yellowstone county, why did they confine the operation of the act to only those portions, thereafter segregated? The whole spirit of these laws, and the history of events, and the common as well as the legal understanding of words, lead irresistibly to the conclusion, which we have held from the commencement of the investigation, that this portion of territory belongs to Custer county for the purposes of taxation. We have indulged in this otherwise unnecessarily voluminous discussion of what has always seemed to us a very clear proposition, by reason of the manifest injustice which this condition of affairs works upon Yellowstone county, and our desire to find some remedy for this injustice. Custer county, otherwise compact in form, stretches out over its neighbor, a shoe-string district, 105 miles long and 400 feet wide. Custer county takes the fruits of the land in the way of taxes, and leaves to Yellowstone the labor and expenses of maintenance. This injustice is so glaring and absurd that it demands immediate legislative remedy. That remedy is not at the hand of this court, and we can do nothing but affirm the judgment of the district court, which is accordingly done.

MUNDELL v. CITY OF PASADENA. (No. 14,013.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1891.)

CITY MARSHALS' FEES.

St. Cal. 1883, p. 93, § 855, provides that marshals of cities of the sixth class shall receive a compensation to be fixed by ordinance by the board of trustees. Section 880, prescribing the marshal's duties, provides that he shall, for service of any process, receive the same fees as constables. Held, that the compensation fixed by the trustees under section 855 was for all duties imposed on the marshal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Gage & Roberts, for appellant. W. A. Arthur, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover for services rendered by the plaintiff as city marshal of the defendant. A general demurrer to the complaint was interposed and sustained. The plaintiff declined to amend, and thereupon the court gave judgment that he take nothing. From that judgment he appeals. The facts stated in the complaint are in substance as follows: In April, 1886, and again in 1888, the plaintiff was duly elected city marshal of the city of Pasadena, a municipal corporation of the sixth class. Each term of office was two years, and after each election he duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his official duties. His compensation for both terms was fixed by the board of trustees of the city at $800 per year, and was paid. Between the 31st day of July, 1886, and the 30th day of April, 1888, he rendered services to the defendant corporation, in arresting offenders, and summoning witnesses and jurors, by virtue of warrants of arrest, subpoenas, and venires duly and regularly issued out of the recorder's court of the city, and for these services the defendant became and is indebted to him in the sum of $863.55. Again, between the 1st day of May, 1888, and the 22d day of March, 1889, he rendered other like services, for which the defendant became and is indebted to him in the sum of $318.25. Before commencing his action, he demanded of defendant payment of both sums, but the defendant refused, and still refuses, to pay the same, or any part thereof. The act of the legislature, entitled "An act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations," approved March 13, 1883, (St. 1883, p. 93,) provides, in the chapter relating to "Municipal corporations of the sixth class," (section 855,) that "the clerk, treasurer, marshal, and recorder shall severally receive, at stated times, a compensation to be fixed by ordinance by the board of trustees, which compensation shall not be increased or diminished after their election, or during their several terms of office." And section 880 of the same chapter provides what duties the marshal shall be required to perform. Among other things, it says: "He shall and is hereby authorized to execute and return all process issued and directed to him by any legal authority. * * * He shall, for service of any process, receive the same fees as constables. He may appoint, subject to the approval of the board of trustees, one or more deputies, for whose acts he and his bondsmen shall be responsible, whose only compensation shall be fees for the service of process, which shall be the same as those allowed to the marshal." In Pritchett v. Stanislaus Co., 73 Cal. 310, 14 Pac. Rep. 795, the plaintiff was marshal of the city of Modesto, a city of the sixth class, in the county of Stanislaus. He brought his action against the county to recover for services rendered by him in the execution of process, such as warrants of arrest and subpoenas, issued out of a justice's court of the county in criminal cases. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed and sustained. It was said by this court, referring to the provisions of the statute above quoted: "The compensation fixed by the board of trustees under section 855 is to be for all duties imposed on the marshal by the act. These duties are set forth in section 880, (St. 1883, p. 277,) and include the duty to execute and return all process issued and directed to him by any legal authority, and by the same section, for the service of any process, he is to receive the same fees as constables." And again: "It does not appear that the board of trustees of the city of Modesto has passed any ordinance fixing the compensation of the marshal, but we presume it has. If it has passed such ordinance, the marshal is only entitled to the compensation so fixed. If no such ordinance has been passed by it, then the marshal can recover nothing." It was held that the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment was affirmed. That case is directly in point here, and upon its authority it must be held that the demurrer in this case was properly sustained, and the judgment must be affirmed. So ordered.

COOPER V. COOPER. (No. 13,908.)

DIVORCE—EVIDENCE OF PARTY—CORROBORATION.

A wife suing for divorce testified to various acts of violence, and her attorney testified the husband was a man of violent passions, and in private conversation had admitted to the witness that he had used violence upon the wife on various occasions, had pinched her arms, forcibly prevented her from leaving the house, and applied harsh names to her. It was shown also that he began an action for divorce, which he discontinued before this suit, alleging that she attempted to poison the minds of their children against him, and had stated in their presence that she hoped some accident would befall him, so he could not return, and that she had threatened to kill him. Held sufficient corroboration under Civil Code Cal. § 180, forbidding a divorce on the uncorroborated evidence or admissions of the party.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

J. W. Hughes, (A. L. Hart, of counsel,) for appellant. Chauncey H. Dunn, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The complaint charged the defendant with many acts of cruelty, extending over a period of several years, and the answer admitted all the averments of the complaint in this regard. After trial, the court found that all the averments of the complaint were true; that $5,000 would be a fair share of the community property for the plaintiff, and that the property rights of the parties had been amicably settled; that the defendant was better fitted to have the care, custody, and control of the children than the plaintiff, and was better able to support them. A decree was accordingly entered, dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the parties, and awarding to the plaintiff $5,000 as her share of the property, and to the defendant the care and custody of the two minor children. Within 10 days after the decree was entered the plaintiff changed her attorney, and moved for a new trial, on the ground that the findings were not justified by the evidence, because they were supported only by her own uncorroborated testimony. The motion was denied, and thereupon she appealed from the judgment and order. At the trial the plaintiff was a witness, and testified to many acts of cruelty on the part of the defendant, such as repeatedly calling her harsh and opprobrious names, threatening her with violence, seizing her with great force and violence, pinching her arms until they were black and blue, striking her upon the face and body, leaving black and blue marks from his blows, throwing her upon the floor in a rude, angry, and threatening manner, and compelling her to leave the family residence and seek shelter elsewhere, which acts, as she said, were committed without any fault or provocation on her part, and had caused her great physical pain and mental anguish and sorrow. She also testified that about two years before—and this was alleged in the complaint—the defendant commenced an action against her for divorce on the ground of cruelty "without any cause therefor, and finally dismissed the same after having shamed and humiliated me by the charges which he brought against me." The complaint in the former action was introduced in evidence, and it stated, among other things, that the defendant, (plaintiff here,) by innuendoes and slurs and untruths, had attempted to poison the minds of the children of the parties against the plaintiff "for the purpose of causing them to mistrust and dislike plaintiff, and to deprive plaintiff of the affection of his said children naturally due him; that continuously since said defendant's return from Chicago, as aforesaid, she has said in the presence of and to said children, when plaintiff was absent or about to be absent from the city of Sacramento, the residence of plaintiff and defendant, attending to plaintiff's business, that she hoped some accident would befall plaintiff, so that he could not, or, for some other reason, would not, or ever, return to defendant or to said children; that on or about the 3d day of January, A. D. 1886, she (defendant) threatened to kill plaintiff, and has since said she then intended to do so." Grove L. Johnson, the plaintiff's attorney, was also called as a witness in her behalf, and testified that he was well acquainted with the plaintiff and defendant; that he had known them for many years; that the defendant, in conversation with him, had admitted that on several occasions he had used violence upon the plaintiff; that he had seized her by the arm, and forcibly prevented her from leaving the house on several occasions; that on one occasion he had pinched plaintiff's arms, and that he had also used harsh and opprobrious names to her. He further testified that the defendant is a man of strong and ungovernable temper, and accustomed to have his own way; that the plaintiff is a small, frail, and delicate woman, and her constitution is such that she cannot stand much mental suffering; that he knew of the divorce proceedings brought by defendant against the plaintiff, in which defendant charged plaintiff with cruelty; that Mrs. Cooper was afraid to and did not contest the same; that Mr. Cooper dismissed them of his own motion after they had come partly to trial; that said divorce proceedings had caused Mrs. Cooper much sorrow and trouble and grievous mental suffering, and had troubled her mentally a great deal, as the witness had ascertained and seen from many conversations with her. The above was, in substance, all the testimony showing cause for a divorce, and the only question is, was the plaintiff's testimony sufficiently corroborated to meet the requirements of section 130 of the Civil Code? That section provides: "No divorce can be granted upon the default of the defendant, or upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties." Under this section it evidently is not necessary that the plaintiff's testimony be corroborated as to every fact and circumstance testified to. It is enough if there be corroboration as to some fact or facts which is or are sufficient to support the action and justify the entry of a decree in plaintiff's favor. Matthai v. Matthai, 49 Cal. 90. In Evans v. Evans, 41 Cal. 103, the court, speaking of the statute then in force, and which was similar to the provision of the Code above quoted, said: "The statute does not define to what extent the corroboration must go. In the very nature of the case it would be impossible to lay down any general rule as to the degree of corroboration which will be requisite. Hence, the statute only requires that there shall be some corroborating evidence." We think there was some corroborating evidence in this case. One of the acts of cruelty alleged in the complaint was the institution by the defendant against the plaintiff of a former suit for divorce, without any cause therefor. The charges made in the complaint in that case, if untrue, were extremely cruel and unjust, and such as no husband should ever be permitted to make against his wife. That the charges were made was shown by the complaint itself, which was introduced in evidence; and that they were untrue must be presumed from the fact that the plaintiff voluntarily dismissed his suit, though he had by threats and fear prevented the defendant from appearing to contest it. These facts, with the testimony of Mr. Johnson, certainly corroborated the plaintiff's testimony as to one act of extreme cruelty on the part of the defendant, and we think this sufficient corroboration to uphold the judgment. It follows, in our opinion, that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that the plaintiff is not a "party aggrieved" within the meaning of sections 657, 938, Code Civil Proc. Plaintiff was granted all the relief she prayed for. She was asked by the court whether she wanted the children, and she replied that she did not, because Mr. Cooper had always been kind to them, always had the care of them, and could take better care of them than she could. The property rights of the parties had been settled amicably between them. There is nothing, therefore, in the record upon which the plaintiff can base a claim of grievance; and I am at a loss to understand the object of the motion for a new trial and of this appeal. While it is true, as stated in McBlane v. McBlane, (Cal.) 20 Pac. Rep. 61, cited in the briefs, the public has an interest in the result of every action for divorce, and the court, on grounds of public policy, should exercise its discretion to the fullest extent in securing to both parties a full and fair hearing on the merits, the public has no right to appeal, nor has any one the right to represent it. Plaintiff probably desires a new trial for the purpose of securing some additional relief in regard to property matters, but as to such matters the public has no more interest than it has in any other action involving property rights.

JOINT DEFENDANTS—SEVERAL JUDGMENT.

Where an action for money is brought against three defendants alleged in the complaint to be indebted to plaintiff, and the court finds that all the allegations of the complaint are true, a judgment against two of them only, on such finding, is erroneous.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Henry McPike, for appellants. D. C. Ward, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff brought this action against W. D. Shawhan, Mary Shawhan, and John E. Shawhan, and alleged in his amended complaint that on the 22d day of December, 1886, "the said defendants, and each of them," were indebted to his assignor in the sum of $408.55, for certain merchandise "sold and delivered to said defendants at their special instance and request." The defendants answered the complaint, denying all of its allegations. The court, having tried the cause without a jury, made the following finding of fact: "That all the allegations and averments in the plaintiff's amended complaint are true;" and, as a conclusion of law, found "that said plaintiff is entitled to judgment against said defendants W. D. Shawhan and Mary Shawhan, and each of them," for the sum claimed in the complaint. Judgment was thereupon entered against the defendants W. D. Shawhan and Mary Shawhan only, and from this judgment they have appealed. It was error in the court below to render judgment against them upon the facts found by it without at the same time rendering judgment against their co-defendant, John E. Shawhan; and for this error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HABEAS CORPUS—REGULARITY OF JUDGMENT.

Where a judgment of conviction, regular on its face, is rendered against a vagrant under Pen. Code Cal. § 647, he will not be released from confinement in the house of correction on habeas corpus on the ground that the first clause of that section is unconstitutional, it not appearing under which clause he was convicted.

In bank. Habeas corpus.

J. A. Harris, for the prisoner. Wm. S. Barnes, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. This is a proceeding upon habeas corpus. It appears from the return to the writ issued that F. P. Morrison, the person in whose behalf the writ was issued, is detained by the superintendent of the house of correction of the city and county of San Francisco, under and by virtue of a judgment of the police court of said city and county, convicting the said Morrison of the crime of vagrancy, and adjudging that he be imprisoned therefor in said house of correction for the period of 90 days. The judgment was rendered February 5, 1891. The judgment appears to be regular on its face, and it does not appear therefrom under which clause of section 647 of the Penal Code said Morrison was convicted. It was argued that the first clause of this section is unconstitutional, but we cannot assume, for the purpose of passing on this question, or of discharging the prisoner, that this is the particular clause under which the conviction was had. The complaint, upon which the judgment was rendered, is not in this record. We cannot say from the record before us that the judgment is void. The said Morrison is remanded, and the writ discharged.

ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—RIGHTS OF HEIR—NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

1. Where a husband and wife declare a homestead on property they have mortgaged, the mortgage must be presented against the husband's estate for allowance after his death, notwithstanding the complaint in foreclosure expressly waives all recourse to any property of the estate except that described in the mortgage.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1490, providing that notice to creditors of an estate "must be published as often as the judge or court shall direct, but not less than once a week for four weeks," a notice published for the first time on July 24th, and once a week thereafter, till August 21st, inclusive, while the order of publication was not made till August 2d, is ineffectual, and a claim presented December 20th following, and allowed, is in time.

3. Though by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2011, the affidavit of publication is made evidence of the fact, it is prima facie evidence only; and where the files of the newspaper in which the notice was published show that it was published once a week from July 24th to August 21st, inclusive, they will prevail over the affidavit that the notice was published on August 23th also.

4. Though a mortgage is allowed against the estate by the administratrix, and approved by the judge, the heir is not bound thereby, but may, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1636, giving him the right to contest claims that have been improperly allowed in the probate proceedings, show, in an action to foreclose the mortgage, that the debt has been paid, or that payments thereon have not been credited.

5. The appellate court cannot direct final judgment upon evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; CHARLES H. MARKS, Judge.

Edward P. Cole and E. Jackman, for appellants. J. K. Law, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This was a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The trial court gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed. This is the second time the case has come before the appellate court. The former judgment, which was upon demurrer, was reversed upon the ground that the complaint was not subject to the objections taken by the demurrer; and the court held, among other things, that the allowance of a claim by an administrator, and its approval by the judge, stopped the running of the statute of limitations. See 72 Cal. 544, 14 Pac. Rep. 204. As a matter of course, nothing that was then decided is open to question now. The facts material to the present appeal are as follows: The mortgage sought to be foreclosed was made in 1877 by John Connell and Sarah, his wife, to secure the payment of a note made by the former. After the execution of the note and mortgage they declared a homestead upon the property, and subsequently the husband died, leaving an estate of less than $10,000. On the 19th of July, 1880, letters of administration were issued to the wife, and, in accordance with section 1491 of the Code of Civil Procedure, she gave notice to creditors to present their claims within four months from the first publication of the notice. The first publication was on July 24, 1880, but there was no order for publication until August 2d. The findings show a sufficient publication of the notice, but the evidence does not, as will be explained below. On November 27th a decree of due notice to creditors was made. On the 20th of the following December the plaintiffs presented their claim, and it was allowed by the administratrix as presented, and approved by the judge, and filed on the next day. On the 27th of the same month an order was made that the homestead be set apart to the widow, and a little more than a year afterwards she died. Letters of administration upon her estate were issued to the defendant Hallinan, and letters upon her husband's estate were issued to the defendant Williams. The complaint states that the plaintiffs "expressly waive any and all recourse upon said note and mortgage against any property of the estate of said John Connell, other than the land above described as included in said mortgage." It does not appear what, if any, interest the wife had in the property at the time the mortgage was made; and nothing is said, either in the pleadings, findings, or evidence, as to the presentation of a claim to the wife's administrator. The counsel seem to have assumed that it was not necessary to present such a claim, and, following their lead, we have confined our examination to the husband's estate.

1. Inasmuch as a homestead had been declared upon the property, it was necessary to present a claim against the husband's estate, notwithstanding the waiver contained in the complaint. Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. Rep. 375; Association v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 23 Pac. Rep. 376. As has been stated, the claim was presented and allowed by the administratrix, and approved by the judge. But the respondents contend that such presentment and allowance was after the time prescribed by law, and, for that reason, of no effect. We do not agree with respondents on this point. The first publication was made on July 24, 1880, but no order for publication was made until August 2d. Now we do not think that a publication in advance of the order of court was of any validity. The statute provides that the notice "must be published as often as the judge or court shall direct, but not less than once a week for four weeks." Code Civil Proc. § 1490. The legal period of publication is to be fixed by the judge. Until he acts, it cannot be known whether the period of publication will exceed the statutory minimum or not. Without an order therefor there can be no legal period of publication, and consequently no authority for publishing. Now, inasmuch as the paper was a weekly paper, and the first publication was on July 24th, there must have been two publications before the order was made, viz., one on July 24th and one on July 31st, and, under the view we have taken, these two publications were of no effect. Notwithstanding this, however, if the affidavit were the only evidence on the subject, a sufficient publication would be shown; for it states that notice was published "once every week from the 24th day of July, 1880, to and until the 28th of August, 1880, both days inclusive," which would give four publications after the order was made, viz.: August 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th. But the affidavit is not the only evidence on the subject. The files of the newspaper itself were introduced, and they showed that the notice was not published on August 28th. This contradicted the affidavit. Now, while the affidavit was made evidence by the statute, it is prima facie evidence only. Id. § 2011. And the newspaper itself is certainly more satisfactory evidence of its contents than any affidavit would be, and we do not regard the decree, establishing due notice to creditors, as conclusive. It results that there were only three publications after the order for publication was made, and this is below the statutory minimum. The presentation and allowance of the claim were therefore in time.

2. The court found that all that was due upon the claim had been paid except $861; and the appellants contend that this finding is not sustained by the evidence, and that the allowed claim could not be impeached by evidence that it had been paid previous to its allowance. There is evidence sufficient to sustain this finding of the court, and it was competent in this case for the son and heir of the deceased mortgagor to show either that the debt to secure which the mortgage was given had been paid, or that payments thereon had been made, and not credited. The allowance of the claim by the administratrix, and its approval as allowed by the judge of the court in which the estate of the deceased mortgagor is being administered, are not conclusive upon the heir. Such action would not of itself be conclusive, if the administratrix or plaintiffs were proceeding in the superior court to obtain a decree in the probate proceeding directing that such allowed claim be paid, and no greater effect can be given to it in this action. The plaintiffs cannot, by resorting to this action, deprive the heir of the right given him by section 1636 of the Code of Civil Procedure to show that their claim was improperly allowed in the administration proceedings.

3. The cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations. As we have stated, it does not appear what, if any, interest the wife had in the property at the time the mortgage was made, and as no claim was presented against her estate, if she had any separate interest it could not be reached by the case as it is presented. And, so far as her rights as successor in interest of her husband are concerned, it was held upon the former appeal that the allowance of the claim stopped the running of the statute of limitations.

4. Appellants ask that final judgment in their favor be directed. But it is the settled rule here that the appellate court cannot direct final judgment upon evidence. The case must go back to the trial court to have the facts established. Judgment and order reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1891.)

SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

On appeal the court below will not be held to have abused its discretion in setting aside a judgment quieting title in plaintiff, on a showing that the disclaimer filed by defendant's attorney was under a misapprehension on his part that defendant's conveyance of the property to a third person was made before commencement of the suit.

lant. T. J. De Puy and C. C. Stephens, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to quiet title to several parcels of land situate in the city of Los Angeles. A lis pendens was filed by plaintiff at the time the action was commenced. The defendant filed her verified answer, denying that plaintiff had any right, title, or interest in any of the lots described in the complaint. After this answer was filed, the defendant sold and conveyed to the respondents, John S. Underwood, Mary E. Regan, and Samuel A. Moore, all of the lots described in the complaint, except "lot 13 in block A." There after, the attorney of defendant having died, she employed another attorney, who, after being informed by her of all the facts, filed an amended and unverified answer, disclaiming on the part of the defendant any interest in any of the property described in the complaint, except said lot 13. The court found that defendant was the owner of said lot 13 in block A, and that plaintiff was the owner of the other lots in controversy, and judgment was entered accordingly on April 18, 1889. On July 22, 1889, the defendant moved the court to set aside the judgment, and for permission to amend her amended answer by striking out said disclaimer, on the ground that the amended answer containing the disclaimer had been filed through inadvertence and mistake. In support of her application she filed an affidavit setting forth that upon the advice of her first attorney she had sold the property (described in the disclaimer) to said Underwood, Regan, and Moore in good faith, and for valuable consideration; that, upon the death of her attorney, she had employed another counsel, and the latter, after being informed of all the facts, filed an amended answer containing the disclaimer, "he believing and understanding that said conveyances were made prior to the commencement of this action;" that "said disclaimer was an inadvertence and mistake of fact; that judgment was entered against her by reason of said mistake, and that she had no notice of the state of pleadings until July 10, 1889, when a writ of assistance was served on one of her grantees." Affidavits were filed by John S. Underwood and Mary E. Regan, alleging that the facts set forth in defendant's affidavit were true, and asking that they might be allowed to come in and defend against the claim of the plaintiff. The attorney who filed the amended answer made an affidavit showing that when he drew it he understood that the property described in the disclaimer had been conveyed by defendant before the suit was commenced. Counter-affidavits were filed by Horace Bell, showing that they had taken a portion of the property described in the disclaimer from the plaintiff for a valuable consideration subsequent to the judgment, without notice of any transfer by defendant, and after a search of the record, which failed to disclose any conveyance from defendant, and after the attorney for defendant had informed them that he knew of nothing that would invalidate the conveyance to them. The court granted the motion to set aside the judgment, and from its order the plaintiff has appealed. The showing made on motion to set aside the judgment is a very weak one, but we are always unwilling to interfere with the decision of the court below in matters of this kind. The attorney for the defendant doubtless acted in good faith, and, as he supposed, for the best interest of his client, but under a mistake of fact as to the time when defendant had parted with her interest in the lots. We cannot say, under all the circumstances, that the court below abused its discretion. The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

(No. 14,066.)

On rehearing. For former report, see ante, 160.

DE HAVEN, J. The appeal in this case was dismissed by the court in bank on December 11, 1890, and a rehearing thereafter granted. Upon full consideration we are satisfied with our former opinion, and for the reasons therein stated the motion to dismiss the appeal must be granted. It is true that for some purposes a day is regarded as an indivisible unit, and that, in the cases where such rule properly applies, courts refuse to look into fractions of a day for the purpose of determining which of two acts was first in point of time; but, when the question whether one legal right shall have priority over another depends upon the order of events occurring on the same day, this rule is necessarily departed from. Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 689; Louisville v. Bank, 104 U. S. 474. And in Maine v. Gilman, 11 Fed. Rep. 214, it is said: "It is insisted that the law knows no fractions of a day. But this ancient maxim is now chiefly known by its exceptions. When private rights depend upon it, the courts inquire into the hour at which an act was done, or a decree was entered, or an attachment was laid, or any title accrued." In the case of Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 313, the material fact, as to whether the notice of motion to dismiss was given prior to the time of filing the transcript, was a matter of controversy, and what was there said about not looking into fractions of a day for the purposes of dismissing an appeal must be considered as having reference only to the then state of facts before the court, and the general language there used should not be considered as furnishing a rule for a case like this, in which it is not denied that the notice of motion to dismiss was given before the filing of the transcript on appeal. Appeal dismissed.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—OCCUPATION OF GOVERNMENT LAND—BONA FIDE POSSESSION—TRUST.

In 1860 a married man went into possession of part of the government land known as the "Outside Lands" of San Francisco. In 1863 he died, and his wife, with their children, continued in possession, and was in possession at the passage of Act Cong. March 8, 1866, (14 U. S. St. at Large, p. 4,) relinquishing and granting the right and title of the United States in said land to the city of San Francisco, in trust, to be "disposed of and conveyed by said city to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants on the passage of this act," on such terms as the legislature should prescribe. Thereafter the city deeded the land to the widow, she having complied with the various ordinances and legislative acts relative thereto. Held, that she took the lands not absolutely in her own right, but in trust for her children. Per BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

For majority opinion, see ante, 489.

BEATTY, C. J., (dissenting.) Respondent's petition for a rehearing of this cause having been denied by the court, I cannot allow the occasion to pass without expressing my dissent from the conclusion of the department upon the point principally considered in the opinion of Justice THORNTON. If the decision of the court had been rested upon the proposition that under the homestead laws of California Mrs. Baker, on the death of her husband, became by right of survivorship the sole and exclusive owner, as against her children, of the entire estate in the lands covered by their joint declaration of homestead, irrespective of its value at the time of such declaration or of her husband's death, I might not have dissented from that view. But the judgment and order of the superior court are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, to be had in accordance with the views expressed in the opinion, which thereby become, and must remain, the law of the case. Among the views so expressed is one from which I feel constrained to express my dissent. It is held—as I understand the opinion—that Mrs. Baker, by mere force of the act of congress of 1866, granting to the city of San Francisco the outside lands, and independent of any right accruing to her under our homestead laws, became entitled to a conveyance from the city of all the lands left in her possession by the death of her husband, to be held by her in her own right, to the exclusion of her children. This conclusion is based upon a narrow and literal construction of the clause of the act requiring the city to convey the lands granted to the parties in bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants at the date of the passage of the act. It assumes either that the person lawfully in possession by himself or tenant at the date of the passage of the act was the sole object of the bounty of the government, without regard to the character or capacity in which he had obtained or held the possession, or it assumes that when John H. Baker died in 1863, leaving his widow and minor children in possession of the land in controversy, he had no estate in the land to which they could succeed, and that the possession so devolved upon her as head of the family was held by her absolutely in her own right, and not in any representative capacity. If this is true,—if the children of John H. Baker inherited no interest in this land from him when he died,—it must be equally true that if their mother also had died before the passage of the act of 1866, they would have inherited nothing from her. What, then, would have happened? Being minors and orphans, they and the land would naturally have passed into the charge and custody of a guardian, who would have been found in the bona fide actual possession of the land, as head of the family, at the passage of the act of 1866. Such guardian would have been just as clearly within the literal terms of the act in the case supposed, as Mrs. Baker actually was in the case as it is; and if the representative character in which she held the possession, and her trust relation to her children, must be ignored, so must the representative character and trust relation of the guardian have been ignored; and on precisely the same reasoning which sustains the exclusive right of Mrs. Baker to receive a conveyance of the land, it must have been held that the guardian was entitled to a conveyance of the land to the exclusion of his wards. But I venture to say that no court would have carried the principle here decided, to this, its logical and necessary consequence. In my opinion it would have been held, in the case supposed, that it was the duty of the guardian to obtain a conveyance of the lands from the city, and that he would hold them, when so conveyed, in trust for his wards, according to their several and respective rights as heirs and successors of their deceased parents. And, upon the same grounds, I am of the opinion that Mrs. Baker, when she obtained a conveyance of these lands, (considering the matter without reference to her rights under the homestead law,) held them in trust for her children, according to their respective rights as heirs of her deceased husband.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACT—INTEREST.

Where the first contract between the vendor and vendee provides for the payment of interest on the purchase price, but a subsequent contract or memorandum fails to mention interest, the vendor nevertheless is entitled to it from the vendee who takes possession, receives the rents, and pays one item of interest after the execution of the second contract, and whose evidence fails to show that there was a mutual understanding that interest was not to be paid.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

Thos. H. Tongue, for defendant.

LORD, J. This is a suit to recover $750 and interest, based on the terms of certain contracts for the sale of land, specified in the complaint, and to foreclose an alleged mortgage upon the same. The only question involved in the case is as to the payment of interest; the plaintiff claiming that he is entitled to it, and the defendant denying such liability, under the provisions of their contracts. The first contract provides that interest shall be paid annually at the rate of 8 per cent., and that the purchase price of $750 for the land may be paid at any time within 10 years. The other contract, if it may be so called, made shortly thereafter, makes no reference to the payment of the interest, and seems to be somewhat in the nature of a memorandum. All agree that the two writings must be construed in the light of their surroundings to determine the question involved. The plaintiff's testimony is to the effect that he never agreed nor understood any change in this particular was to be made in the original contract, and that the failure to insert interest was an omission and mistake. If the contract was to have been changed in this respect, it would have required some such mutual understanding between the parties; but the testimony of the defendant does not disclose that any such agreement was made, but it does indicate that the defendant understood or expected to pay interest after the second contract was signed. There would seem to be no other explanation of his conduct in making the payment of $50 as interest, and in the execution of a mortgage, which, though, for sundry reasons, was not accepted, nevertheless provided for the payment of interest upon the purchase price. Construing these writings together in the light of surrounding circumstances, we think the intention is to charge interest, and that there is no conflict between them. Nor does this result work any hardship. The record presents the case of a plaintiff as vendor, who has delivered the possession of his property to the defendant as a purchaser at the time, or near thereto, when the original contract was made, which the defendant has continued to enjoy without molestation ever since. Nor is this all; he has not only received the rents and profits, but has also held the purchase money. It is not equity that he should keep both, nor according to the ordinary course of business transactions. Whatever labor he may have expended on the property was for his own benefit, and to increase its value; and it sounds inequitable that he should enjoy the plaintiff's property during all the time for nothing. We think it is more equitable, after having been in the enjoyment of the estate, receiving its rents and profits, that the defendant should pay the interest. The judgment, therefore, must be modified so as to allow the plaintiff interest, and neither party will recover costs and disbursements.

KINGMAN, P. & W. R. CO. v. QUINN.

PLEADING AND PROOF—CASE ON APPEAL—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

1. The first rule governing in the production of evidence is that the evidence offered must correspond with the allegations, and be confined to the point in issue. Brookover v. Esterly, 12 Kan. 152; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 50, 51.

2. A mere general averment of fraud and illegality, without stating the facts on which the charge is based, presents no issue, and no proof is admissible thereunder. State v. Williams, 39 Kan. 517, 18 Pac. Rep. 727.

3. The case made may be very brief, much more so than a transcript, and was devised mainly for the purpose of abridging the record and lessening the expense of review. Neiswender v. James, 41 Kan. 463, 21 Pac. Rep. 573.

4. When it is sought to review the action of the trial court in admitting incompetent and irrelevant testimony, it is not necessary that the case made should contain all of the evidence. If it contains the pleadings, the judgment, and sufficient of the evidence showing the errors complained of, and the exceptions thereto, this court has jurisdiction to consider the incompetent evidence excepted; and, if the incompetent evidence is material and prejudicial to the party objecting, it may order a new trial.

Error from district court, Pratt county; S. W. LESLIE, Judge. On motion for rehearing. No opinion on first hearing.

George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, Robert Dunlap, and Fred W. Bentley, for plaintiff in error. J. C. Ellis and J. G. Waters, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. A re-examination of the record in this case satisfies us that the first alleged error was not sufficiently considered in the former opinion. The case was dismissed in this court upon the ground that the evidence was not all preserved in the record. It was stated in the opinion "that the record should contain all of the evidence introduced during the trial of the case in the court below to intelligently consider the questions raised by the plaintiff in error." The first alleged error was "that the court erred in the admission of testimony tending to show that the justice of the peace, at the time of issuing the warrant, was just outside of the limits of his township and that therefore he acted without jurisdiction, and his proceedings were void. Phillips v. Thralls, 26 Kan. 780; Wilcox v. Johnson, 34 Kan. 655, 9 Pac. Rep. 610; Railroad Co. v. Rice, 36 Kan. 593, 14 Pac. Rep. 229. A mere general averment of fraud and illegality, without stating the facts on which the charge is based, presents no issue, and no proof is admissible thereunder. State v. Williams, 39 Kan. 517, 18 Pac. Rep. 727. The petition in the court below contained a copy of the complaint made and filed by James Moore, and also a copy of the warrant issued by F. R. Gammon, the justice of the peace, under which W. J. Quinn was arrested, but did not allege that the acts of the justice were void, because done outside of his township. The petition alleged that F. R. Gammon, the justice, was an agent of the railroad company, and that the arrest of Quinn was illegal and unlawful. If it were intended to prove that the warrant was illegal, because issued by the justice of the peace outside of his own township, allegations to that effect should have been inserted in the petition. In the absence of any such allegations in the pleadings, it was error for the trial court to admit testimony that the warrant was issued, or other acts of the justice were done, in a township where the justice of the peace had no power to act. The admission of this incompetent and irrelevant evidence against objections ought not to have been allowed. Mr. Greenleaf says, of the rules of evidence: "The first of these is that the evidence must correspond with the allegations, and be confined to the point in issue." 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 50, 51; Brookover v. Esterly, 12 Kan. 152. A court ought not, by the admission of incompetent testimony, enlarge the issues, or permit a jury to pass upon a case not made by the pleadings. McGonigle v. Atchison, 33 Kan. 726, 7 Pac. Rep. 550; Railroad Co. v. Irwin, 35 Kan. 286, 10 Pac. Rep. 820. The record in this case contains the pleadings, the special findings, and the judgment of the trial court. It also contains the objectionable testimony concerning the issuance of the warrant in a township where the justice of the peace had no power to act. It was never necessary, when a case was brought to this court upon a bill of exceptions, to set forth any more than was necessary to show the errors complained of, if the record contained the pleadings and judgment. Section 547 of the Code provides that a party desiring to have a judgment of the district court reversed by the supreme court may make a case containing a statement of so much of the proceedings and evidence, or other matters in the action, as may be necessary to present the errors complained of to the supreme court. "There are two methods of bringing a civil case up for review: One upon a case made, and the other upon a transcript. In no other way can the appellate jurisdiction of the court to review such cases be invoked or exercised. The case made may be very brief, much more so than a transcript; and the first named was devised mainly for the purpose of abridging the record, and lessening the expense of review. We are not disposed to discourage brevity in the making of records for review, as it is a much-needed reform." Neiswender v. Ja nes, 41 Kan. 463, 21 Pac. Rep. 573. When it is sought to review the action of the court in admitting incompetent and irrelevant testimony, it is not necessary that the case made should contain all of the evidence. If it contains the pleadings, the judgment, and sufficient of the evidence showing the errors complained of, this court has jurisdiction to consider the incompetent evidence objected to. In such a case, it is not necessary that the record should contain all of the evidence. Railroad Co. v. Grimes, 38 Kan. 241, 16 Pac. Rep. 472.

It is urged that this court cannot review the objectionable testimony, because the instructions are not given, and it is also urged that the objectionable testimony was not material or prejudicial. The trial court may instruct a jury to disregard incompetent evidence, and such subsequent withdrawal may cure the error in its admission; but even this is not always the case. Whittaker v. Voorhees, 38 Kan. 71, 15 Pac. Rep. 874. But it is evident, from the special findings of the jury, that the jury did not disregard the incompetent evidence admitted; but, upon the other hand, they must have fully considered the same. It evidently had weight with them from the special findings returned. One of the special findings of the jury stated that the warrant was illegal. Other findings tend to show that the justice of the peace issuing the warrant acted outside of his township. The motion for a new trial alleged errors committed upon the trial by the court. Sufficient evidence is preserved in the case made, showing the incompetent evidence admitted and objected to. If this evidence was not prejudicial, the plaintiff below might have suggested an amendment showing that the error was waived or cured; but, in the absence of such showing, we cannot presume that the error was waived or cured. The findings of the jury tend to rebut any waiver or any curative instructions. The evidence was not only material but prejudicial. The decision in the former opinion that a verdict of a jury cannot be challenged upon the ground that it is not supported by any evidence, if a statement is not contained in the case made affirmatively showing that all of the evidence is preserved, is in accord with a long line of decisions of this court. Many of the decisions are there cited. The rehearing will be granted. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

LIMERICK v. HAUN.

CASE MADE—STIPULATION EXTENDING TIME FOR MAKING—AUTHENTICATION.

The attorneys for the parties to a record cannot extend the time for making the case by stipulation between themselves, in the absence of an order of the court or judge granting such an extension. A "case made," signed by the trial judge, but not attested by the clerk of the court with his signature, and the seal of the court, will not be reviewed by the supreme court for alleged errors, when challenged for want of proper authentication.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERICK, Judge.

J. J. Merrick and Quinton & Quinton, for plaintiff in error. Sam S. Slisson and Crooker & Nofztger, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This case was tried by a jury January 25, 1888, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled the same day, and 60 days were given to make a case for this court. The plaintiff brings what purports to be a case made to this court, and asks that certain alleged errors therein be reviewed. The defendant objects to such consideration by this court, and challenges the so-called case made, and says: First, that it was not made and served within time; second, that it was not properly authenticated. Sixty days from January 25, 1888, were given the plaintiff to make a case. Afterwards, the plaintiff applied to the judge of the court to have the time in which to make a case extended to April 10, 1888. The judge allowed the application, and extended the time for making the case to April 10, 1888. Neither the application for the said order of extension nor the order itself is dated, and neither seems to have been filed in the office of the clerk of the court. It is therefore impossible to say whether or not it was made during the life-time of the original order. April 10, 1888, attorneys representing the plaintiff and defendant, by stipulation, extended the time for making a case for this court to May 1, 1888. The case was served April 28, 1888, and 18 days after the last order of the judge had expired, and therefore was out of time so far as any order of the judge is concerned. It was served during the time stipulated for by the attorneys in the case; but the attorneys in the case cannot extend the time for making a case, by agreement, without an order of the court or judge trying the case. Insurance Co. v. Koons, 26 Kan. 215.

The second objection to the consideration of this case made as presented is that it is not properly authenticated, never having been attested by the clerk of the court. This question has just been considered and decided against the plaintiff at this term of the court in the case of Limerick v. Gwinn, 24 Pac. Rep. 1097. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Quinn, ante, 1068. It is recommended that this case be dismissed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

[Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 25, 1891.]

LIENS—MANUFACTURING LUMBER—CLAIM—DESCRIPTION—ENFORCEMENT—PRACTICE.

1. Under Code Wash. § 1942, giving a lien to laborers who assist in manufacturing saw-logs into lumber, and section 1947, requiring the description of the property to be sufficient to identify it with reasonable certainty, a notice of claim of lien sufficiently describes the lumber, though it has no marks, which states that the lien is on "about 100,000 ft., which has been manufactured in Kitsap county, Washington state, and which is marked —, and is now lying at the saw-mill owned by the Builders' Material Co., in Kitsap county, the same being the place where the lumber was manufactured, about two miles south of Port Blakely, on Puget sound."

2. The lien given by the statute is personal, and where a laborer includes in the amount of his claim the assigned claim of another laborer the whole claim is vitiated.

3. The lien given by the statute for assisting in "manufacturing saw-logs into lumber" does not attach to shingles, and where the claim is for labor performed in manufacturing lumber and shingles, the whole lien fails.

4. As the statute requires no statement by the person verifying a claim of lien for another of the facts upon which he bases his belief, a verification by such person to the effect that he believes the claim to be true is sufficient.

5. Where the lien claimants state in their complaint that they claim a lien on the lumber and shingles, but the copy of the lien filed with the complaint shows that the lien is claimed on the lumber only, that part of the complaint referring to the shingles should be disregarded on a motion for judgment by a defendant, whose affirmative averment that the shingle bolts were made by others than plaintiffs is not denied.

6. Where, in such case, the owner of the lumber makes default, but an intervenor has appeared and defended the lien claims, the court cannot enter judgment for the lien claims against the owner before first entering his default.

7. The intervenor, having answered, denying all the plaintiff's allegations, is entitled to a trial.

8. A judgment awarding a lien on the shingles not mentioned in the claim of lien is erroneous.

Code Wash. § 1942, gives a lien to "every person performing labor upon or who shall assist in manufacturing saw-logs into lumber." Section 1947 requires the notice of claim to describe the property to be charged sufficiently for identification with reasonable certainty.

McGilvera, Blaine & De Vries, for appellant. I. A. Murchison, for appellees.

STILES, J. Five plaintiffs—J. M. Sparkman, D. A. McDonald, William Riechers, William Kemery, and W. B. Morris—joined in an action to foreclose laborers' liens on certain lumber and shingles, situated at the saw-mill of the Builders' Material Company, in Kitsap county. The Builders' Material Company was made a party to the action, and was served with process, but it made no appearance. Dexter, Horton & Co., bankers, a corporation, appeared, and demurred to the complaint and each of the separate causes of action therein stated, on the ground that no cause of action was stated. Copies of the several liens were annexed to and made a part of the complaint. The action was brought under section 1947 of the Code. Each of the liens was in substantially the following form: "Notice is hereby given that —, of Kitsap county, Washington state, claims a lien upon all lumber, being about 100,000 ft., which was manufactured in Kitsap county, Washington state, and which is marked thus —; and is now lying at the saw-mill owned by said Builders' Material Co. in Kitsap Co., the same being the place where said lumber was manufactured, and situated about two miles south of Port Blakely, on Puget sound, for labor performed upon and assistance rendered in manufacturing said lumber." Other clauses followed. We are of opinion that this description was sufficient, as against the objection of appellants that the place was not sufficiently located, that the lumber had no marks, and that it is not stated that the logs were manufactured into lumber. It is not usual, we think, to mark lumber; and, as the lien can only be taken upon lumber while still at the mill, it must be left to the proofs to show labor on the lumber upon which it is proposed to establish the lien. Of necessity liens of this class must be less definite than those upon real property, or no effect could be given to the statute. A mill which is "about two miles south of Port Blakely, on Puget sound," ought to be easily found. That one who manufactures lumber manufactures it out of logs would seem to be so nearly a violent presumption that it would not be necessary to say it in more abundant language than that used.

The notice of William Kemery alleged his own claim of $32.50, with an offset of $20.80; and it also alleged that the Builders' Material Company was indebted to G. M. Kemery in the sum of $51.25, with an offset of $33.42, which indebtedness had been assigned to claimant. William Kemery claimed a lien for both balances in the gross sum of $29.63. This he could not do. The lien given by statute is personal to the laborer; it does not run with the chose in action. Having perfected his lien, and thus entitled himself to the equity, an assignment of the debt might entitle the holder to the enforcement of the security thus obtained. There has been much discussion and diversion of opinion among courts and writers on this subject of the assignment of claims and the right of assignees to perfect liens to secure them; but we think the rule announced is the better one under our present statute. Having confused the two demands, plaintiff failed to comply with the statute, and lost all right to take benefit of the foreclosure.

The lien of J. M. Sparkman was like the others, excepting it was for labor in manufacturing the 100,000 feet of lumber and 300,000 shingles, at wages of $3 per day for 33 days. No lien is given by statute for the manufacture of shingles, unless we hold that shingles are included in the term "lumber." We do not think the statute was intended to cover such an interpretation. It gives a lien only to those persons who labor upon or assist in "manufacturing saw-logs into lumber," which, we take it, means the grosser operation of converting logs into timbers, planks and boards. There could, therefore, be no lien for such part of the plaintiff's labor as was applied to making shingles, and as there was in the claim nothing to show how much was due for labor on the lumber and how much on the shingles, the whole lien failed.

The claim of W. B. Morris was verified by P. A. Ellsworth, to the effect that he believed it to be true. The statute seems to require no statement by the person verifying an instrument of this kind for another of the facts upon which he bases his belief, and lays down a form which may be used. We think the verification was sufficient.

The appellant, after the overruling of its demurrer, in the court below, filed an answer specifically denying the allegations of each cause of action stated in the complaint, and setting up that the shingles made by the Builders' Material Company were cut and sawed from shingle bolts made by other parties than the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs filed no reply to the new matter, and defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings. The court denied the motion, and, we think, properly, except as to the claim of Sparkman. It is true that in his complaint, each of the plaintiffs alleged that he had filed a lien upon all the lumber and shingles at the mill, but the copy of his lien, filed as a part of the complaint, showed how far this was untrue; and, in the absence of any motion to correct the pleadings, that part referring to shingles was to be disregarded, on the motion for judgment. Immediately upon the disposal of the defendant's motion for judgment, the court, without setting the cause for trial, or hearing any proofs, and before any default of the Builders' Material Company had been entered, examined the plaintiff's liens, and entered up judgment against the Builders' Material Company for the full amounts claimed, decreeing the lumber and shingles to be sold. This was error. The default of the Builders' Material Company should have been entered before any judgment was rendered against it. And the defendant Dexter, Horton & Co., bankers, having answered, denying all the plaintiffs' allegations, had a right to have the case set down for trial regularly, to cross-examine witnesses, and to contest the sufficiency of the proofs. The judgment was also erroneous in that it awarded liens to all the plaintiffs upon the shingles, whereas only the lien of Sparkman mentioned shingles. The judgment is therefore reversed, with instructions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to and dismiss the complaints of William Kemery and J. M. Sparkman, and to set down for trial and try the cause involving the other parties. Costs to appellant.

LIENS—MANUFACTURING LUMBER—CLAIM—DESCRIPTION—SUFFICIENCY.

A notice of claim of lien on lumber, describing it as "a quantity of lumber, being about 70,000 feet, now lying at defendants' saw-mill in said county," is insufficient, under Code Wash. § 1947, requiring the description of the property to be charged with the lien to be sufficient for identification with reasonable certainty.

Appeal from superior court, Kitsap county.

STILES, J. The plaintiffs in this action, R. J. Wiley, C. W. Wiley, Harry Wiley, E. P. Wand, J. H. Snowden, Chris. Wyman, Thomas J. Oaskey, and C. Brownlee, sought to foreclose laborers' liens upon the same lumber as did the plaintiffs in Dexter, Horton & Co. v. Sparkman, ante, 1070, (just decided.) The pleadings, liens, and proceedings were the same as in the latter case, and for the reasons therein given, if there were no other defects, the same course would be pursued. But all the liens, excepting those of Wand and Snowden, were filed upon the shingles also, with no statements sufficient to show what portion of their labor was upon the lumber alone, which renders them incapable of enforcement. The claims of Wand and Snowden were not open to the objections above named, but the description was: "A quantity of lumber, being about 70,000 feet, * * * now lying at the defendants' saw-mill, in said county." We held in the other case that the same description, with the addition, "being the place where the said lumber was manufactured, and situate about 2 miles south of Port Blakely, on Puget Sound," was sufficient, but cannot sustain this one. The statute (section 1947) requires a description of the property to be charged with a lien, sufficient for identification with reasonable certainty; and there is a great difference between a location two miles along the shore of the sound, below Port Blakely, and the entire county of Kitsap, when it comes to determining where the property liened was. Therefore, in this case, the order will be that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the superior court to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the action. Costs to appellant.

1. In Washington, punitive damages cannot be recovered for personal injuries, however occasioned.

2. A person who undertakes to hoist a heavy safe from a court, through which people are accustomed to pass back and forth, into an upper story of the building, is bound to use such care as the nature of the employment, and the situation and the circumstances surrounding the same, require of a prudent person, experienced and skilled in such or similar work, and is liable for injuries occasioned by the falling of the safe on account of the lack of such care and skill.

3. Where the court has already instructed that, if it did not appear by a preponderance of the evidence that the injury was occasioned by defendant's negligence, there could be no recovery, it may properly refuse to instruct that if the injury occurred by defects in the wall, caused by the elements, not discoverable by ordinary care, defendant was not liable.

Turner & Graves, for appellant. Jesse Arthur, for appellees.

DUNBAR, J. The plaintiff Mina Hoefler had her arm broken, and was otherwise injured, by the falling of a safe, which was being hoisted by the defendant into a five-story brick building, known as the "Eagle Block," in the city of Spokane Falls. Plaintiff had been to the office of her physician, in the second story of said building, where she was accustomed to go for treatment daily, and while returning from such a visit on the 7th day of February, 1890, she passed down the stairway, and into the court or opening under the hoisted safe just as it fell. The said stairway started from the entrance of said court or well on Stevens street, and landed on the north end of the covered way on the second floor of the rear building. Dr. Thiel's office, where Mina Hoefler had been just before she was injured, was in a room on the second floor of the Stevens-Street building, and was the first room north of the Stevens-Street entrance.

There was one other and perhaps main entrance to the building from Riverside avenue, and it is claimed by the defendant that the court or well on that side of the block was used for hoisting heavy articles to the upper stories of the building, and was not generally employed by the public as an entrance to the upper stories of the block; yet we think it fairly appears that the stairway leading from Stevens street was in common use, and that the plaintiff had a right to use it in going to and from the office of her physician. Suit was brought against the defendant, alleging damages in the sum of $5,000. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered for plaintiffs for $2,500, and a judgment rendered for the same, from which judgment an appeal was taken to this court.

The defendant assigns as error the following instructions to the jury, given by the court upon its own motion: "Furthermore, gentlemen, the plaintiffs claim in this action that the defendant was not only guilty of negligence, by reason of which the plaintiff was damaged, but was guilty of gross negligence, and, in case you find they were guilty of gross negligence, a different rule of damages applies to the case." "'Gross negligence' means a wanton and reckless disregard of the rights of other persons taken into consideration with the facts in the case; and, in case you find that it was, then, in addition to the actual damages which you may find for plaintiff, you may assess a sum which the law calls 'exemplary damages.' That means a damage to deter others from being wanton and reckless of the rights of others." Also the following instructions asked by plaintiffs: "If the jury believe from all the evidence that the agent and employes of defendant, the Spokane Truck & Dray Company, in placing the beams and planks across the well-hole, in plaintiffs' petition mentioned as being in the Eagle block, in the city of Spokane Falls, and in any other way, in the construction and preparation of the appliances, for hoisting the safe up and through said well-hole, and, in the hoisting of the same, failed to use such care as the nature of the employment, and the situation and circumstances surrounding the same, required of a prudent person, having had experience, and skilled in such or similar work, and that, by reason thereof, said beam and planks, and other appliances, in the attempt to hoist said safe, gave way or were broken, and fell down through said well-hole, striking plaintiff Mina Hoefler, breaking her arm, and otherwise injuring her, they should find for plaintiff, assessing the damage, if any, at such sum as they find she has sustained, not exceeding $5,000, the amount claimed in the complaint." "The jury is instructed that, if they find for plaintiff under the preceding instruction, in assessing the damage they have a right to consider and allow for the loss of the personal services of plaintiff Mina Hoefler to her family; her mental suffering and bodily pain; the extent of probable duration of the injury; and the prospective loss of service occasioned thereby; also the expense incurred for medicine, nursing, etc., and such reasonable doctor bill as plaintiffs were obligated to pay." "Should the jury find for plaintiffs under instruction No. 1, and also find that defendant's agents and employes, in constructing the appliances for hoisting said safe, and in hoisting the same, were guilty of gross negligence, that is, exercised so little care as to evince a reckless and willful indifference to the safety of plaintiff Mina Hoefel, and all others using said entrance and stairway, then they may find for plaintiffs exemplary damages; that is, damages in money by way of punishment, in addition to the damages they may find under instruction No. 2, in no case exceeding in all the amount of $5,000 claimed in the complaint." The court refused to give the following instruction asked by the defendant, which refusal defendant also assigns as error: "If you find by the evidence that the injury occurred by defects in the wall, caused by the elements, and such defects were not discovered by ordinary care, in the absence of further negligence on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover." So far as the instruction is concerned that was asked for by defendant and refused by the court, we think it had already been substantially given by the court; and it was not necessary to repeat it in another form of words. The court had already instructed the jury that "if it did not appear by a preponderance of testimony that this injury was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant, that it was their duty to find for the defendant." Courts should not be called upon to particularize by referring to certain portions of the testimony. It is a far safer rule to state the law governing the case in general terms.

It is claimed by the defendant that the language used by the court in the first instruction asked by plaintiffs makes the defendant an actual insurer of the safety of the public, and is therefore erroneous. The statement was "that the defendant was bound to use such care as the nature of the employment and the situation and circumstances surrounding the same required of a prudent person having had experience, and skilled in such or similar work." We are unable to see how this instruction could be materially modified. Undoubtedly the "nature of the employment" must be taken into consideration. If it is an employment which is likely to endanger life or property, certainly a greater degree of care would be required than an employment, the careless performing of which would not ordinarily result in injury to person or property. It is plain that "the situation and circumstances surrounding the employment" must be considered; for, applying the rule to a case of this character, a person in hoisting a heavy weight in an unfrequented place, in no way connected with any thoroughfare or passage-way, would not be held to the same degree of care as he would be if the work were being done in a public thoroughfare, where people had a right to pass, and were actually constantly passing. It certainly cannot be gained that "prudence" should be one of the requisite qualifications of a person engaged in such employment. Nor must his qualifications stop here, when engaged in a business which is liable to injuriously affect the public; for he might be an ordinarily prudent man, and yet, if he had no experience or skill in the particular work in which he is engaged, disastrous results would be liable to follow. Language which is not technical must be construed by its ordinarily accepted meaning, and we do not think that the language employed by the court could be so construed as to make the defendant an insurer; and we concur with the counsel for the plaintiffs that it states substantially the same doctrine as the quotation from Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 47, by defendant, where they define ordinary care to be "the care usually bestowed upon the matter in hand by persons accustomed to deal with such matters, and having the prudence of the general class of society to which the person whose conduct is in question belongs."

We next pass to the instruction of the court both upon its own motion and upon the motion of the plaintiffs in relation to punitive damages. This is a question which has engaged the earnest attention of courts and authors. A careful investigation of the discussion of this subject by such noted authors as Greenleaf, Sedgwick, and Parsons, and also other eminent text-writers, and by numerous courts, shows a wonderful diversity of opinion on this interesting subject. The weight of authority, especially considering the older cases, seems to be in favor of the doctrine of punitive damages, but the opposite doctrine has received the support and advocacy of many modern writers, and the judicial sanction of many modern courts; while other courts have frankly stated their repugnance to the doctrine, yet considered themselves bound, by former decisions in their respective states, to still maintain it, appealing to the legislature to relieve them from what they believe to be a pernicious practice. In this state it is a new question, and the court approaches its investigation untrammelled by former decisions, free to accept the reasoning which most strongly appeals to its judgment, and to adopt the rule which, in its opinion, will simplify judicial proceedings, and lead to the least embarrassing complications in the administration of the law, and the determination of rights thereunder. And this desired ultimatum, we think, will best be attained by adopting the rule laid down by Mr. Greenleaf (volume 2, § 253) that "damages are given as a compensation or satisfaction to the plaintiff for an injury actually sustained by him from the defendant. They should be precisely commensurate with the injury, neither more nor less; and this whether it be to his person or his estate,"—although it is stoutly maintained by so eminent an author as Mr. Sedgwick that this definition is too limited, and that, "wherever the elements of fraud, malice, gross negligence, or oppression mingle in the controversy, the law, instead of adhering to the system or even the language of compensation, adopts a wholly different rule. It permits the jury to give what it terms 'punitive,' 'vindictive,' or 'exemplary' damages; in other words, blends together the interests of society and of the aggrieved individual, and gives damages not only to recompense the sufferer, but to punish the offender." 1 Sedg. Dam. p. 38; 7th Ed. p. 53. It seems to us that there are many valid objections to interjecting into a purely civil action the elements of a criminal trial, intermingling into a sort of a medley or legal jumble two distinct systems of judicial procedure. While the defendant is tried for a crime, and damages awarded on the theory that he has been proven guilty of a crime, many of the time-honored rules governing the trial of criminal actions, and of the rights that have been secured to defendants in criminal actions "from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," are absolutely ignored. Under this procedure the doctrine of presumption of innocence, until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, finds no lodgement in the charge of the court, but is supplanted by the rule in civil actions of a preponderance of testimony. The fallacy and unfairness of the position is made manifest when it is noted that a person can be convicted of a crime, the penalty for which is unlimited, save in the uncertain judgment of the jury, and fined to this unlimited extent for the benefit of an individual who has already been fully compensated in damages, on a smaller weight of testimony than he can be in a criminal action proper, brought for the benefit or protection of the state, where the amount of the fine is fixed and limited by law; and, in addition to this, he may be compelled to testify against himself, and is denied the right to meet the witnesses against him face to face under the practice in civil actions of admitting depositions in evidence. Exclusive of punitive damages, the measure of damages as uniformly adopted by the courts and recognized by the law is exceedingly liberal towards the injured party. There is nothing stinted in the rule of compensation. The party is fully compensated for all the injury done his person or his property, and for all losses which he may sustain by reason of the injury, in addition to recompense for physical pain, if any has been inflicted. But it does not stop here; it enters the domain of feeling, tenderly inquires into his mental sufferings, and pays him for any anguish of mind that he may have experienced. Indignities received, insults borne, sense of shame or humiliation endured, lacerations of feelings, disfiguration, loss of reputation or social position, loss of honor, impairment of credit, and every actual loss, and some which frequently border on the imaginary, are paid for under the rule of compensatory damages. The plaintiff is made entirely whole. The bond has been paid in full. Surely the public can have no interest in exacting the pound of flesh. Ordinarily the administration of the laws is divided into two distinct jurisdictions, the civil and the criminal, each governed by rules of procedure, and by rules governing the admission and weight of testimony different and distinct from the other. The province of the civil court is, as its name indicates, to investigate civil rights; there its jurisdiction ends, or ought to end; while the province of the criminal court is, as its name imports, to investigate and punish crime and restrain its commission. And it is to the criminal, and not the civil, jurisdiction that society looks for its protection against criminals. The object of punishment is not to deter the criminal from again perpetrating the crime on the particular individual injured, but for the protection of society at large; and as the state is at the expense of restraining and controlling its criminals, and as fines are imposed for the double purpose of restraining the offender, and of reimbursing the state for its outlay in protecting its citizens from criminals, we are at a loss to know by what process of reasoning, either legal or ethical, the conclusion is reached that a plaintiff in a civil action, under a complaint which only asks for compensation for injuries received, is allowed to appropriate money which is supposed to be paid for the benefit of the state. It is to be presumed that the state has fully protected its own interests, or as fully at least as they could be protected by laws, when it provides for the punishment of crime in its criminal statutes, and fixes the fine at a sum which it deems commensurate with the crime designated; hence, punitive damages cannot be allowed on the theory that it is for the benefit of society at large, but must logically be allowed on the theory that they are for the sole benefit of the plaintiff who has already been fully compensated, a theory which is repugnant to every sense of justice.

Again, while jurors should be the judges of the character and weight of testimony, that judgment should be exercised under some rule, and be amenable to some law, so that an abuse of discretion could be ascertained and corrected; but, under the doctrine of punitive damages, where the whole question is left to the unguided judgment of the jury, and where, under the very nature of the doctrine, no measure of damages can be stated, and hence no limits compelled, where there are no special findings provided for, it would not be often that a court would be warranted in interfering with a verdict, if indeed it could do so at all, if the verdict fell within the amount asked as compensatory damages. Take the case at bar for instance, and the court has no way of ascertaining whether the jury found that the plaintiff had actually been damaged to the full amount of $2,500, or whether they found her actual damages to be $500, and assessed the other $2,000 by way of punishment. It seems to us that a practice which leads to so much confusion and uncertainty in the administration of the law, and that is always liable to lead to injustice, the correction of which is impracticable, cannot be too speedily eradicated from our system of jurisprudence. In this connection, we quote approvingly the language of the supreme court of Indiana in Stewart v. Maddox, 63 Ind. 51. Says the court: "The doctrine of exemplary or punitive damages rests upon a very uncertain and unstable basis. It is almost equivalent to giving the jury the power to make the law of damages in each case; and in a case where the defendant is a commanding, popular, influential person, and the plaintiff of an opposite character, and the local and temporary excitement of the time happens to be in favor of the defendant, the jury is apt to be reluctant in giving even pecuniary compensation, without adding anything by way of exemplary or punitive damages; while, in a case in which the character of the parties and the circumstances are reversed, the jury will be liable to push their powers to an unwarranted and unconscionable extent, dangerous to justice and the security of settled rights." Says the court in Murphy v. Hobbs, 7 Colo. 541, 5 Pac. Rep. 119: "The reflecting lawyer is naturally curious to account for this 'heresy' or 'deformity,' as it has been termed. Able and searching investigation made by both jurists and writers disclose the following facts concerning it, viz.: That it was entirely unknown to the civil law; that it never obtained a foothold in Scotland; that it finds no real sanction in the writings of Blackstone, Hammond, Comyns, or Rutherford; that it was not recognized in the earlier English cases; that the supreme courts of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Indiana, Iowa, Nebraska, Michigan, and Georgia have rejected it in whole or in part; that of late other states have falteringly retained it because committed so to do; that a few years ago it was correctly said, 'At last accounts the court of queen's bench was still sitting hopelessly involved in the meshes of what Mr. Chief Justice QUAIN declared to be "utterly inconsistent propositions;" and that the rule is comparatively modern, resulting in all probability from a misconception of impassioned language and inaccurate expressions used by judges in some of the earlier English cases.' And in support of this theory the Colorado court quotes Mr. Justice FOSTER in Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342, who concludes a discussion of the expression "smart money" as used by Grotius and jurists contemporary with that author, in the following language: "It is interesting, as well as instructive, to observe that one hundred and twenty years ago the term 'smart money' was employed in a manner entirely different from the modern signification which it has obtained, being then used as indicating compensation for smarts of the injured person, and not, as now, money required by way of punishment, and to make the wrong-doer smart." Some courts have held that it was in violation of the constitutional guaranty "that no person should be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense," where the criminal code provided a punishment for the same offense, and some have restricted or limited its abrogation to cases where the act charged to have been committed was made punishable by law; but, without expressing any opinion on the constitutional question, we believe that the doctrine of punitive damages is unsound in principle, and unfair and dangerous in practice, and that the instruction of the court on the subject of punitive damages was erroneous. With this view of the law it is not necessary to examine the further objection urged by defendant, "that this was not a proper case for the application of the doctrine of punitive damages." The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

HABEAS CORPUS — LEGALITY OF JUDGMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under the statute of Washington, providing that no court shall inquire into the legality of any judgment or process whereby a party is in custody, when such custody is upon final process issued on final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, a person sentenced by a court of general jurisdiction cannot be released on habeas corpus, as the judgment cannot be gone behind for any purpose.

Marshall K. Snell and Heilig & Huston, for petitioner. W. C. Jones and Charles Bedford, for respondent.

HOYT, J. Upon the return of the officer to the order to show cause issued herein and the hearing had thereon, two questions are presented for our determination: First, as to the power of the legislature to provide for prosecution for offenses committed before we became a state, by information; second, as to whether or not the court, in habeas corpus proceedings, will go behind the final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction for any purpose whatever. We will discuss the second question first. Our statute provides that no court shall inquire into the legality of any judgment or process whereby the party is in custody, when such custody is upon any process issued on any final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; and if the words "final judgment" mean what they say, it would seem to preclude the issuing of the writ in the case at bar. But it is contended by petitioner that these words refer only to judgments in cases where the court pronouncing it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that particular case, and of the person of the defendant; that all other judgments are void, and therefore nullities; that, however general the jurisdiction of the court might be, it would not be a court of competent jurisdiction as to that particular judgment, unless it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit and of the person of the defendant. With this contention of the petitioner we should probably agree, when applied to judgments of courts of special or limited jurisdiction, for the reason that the judgments of such courts do not even prima facie prove their jurisdiction to pronounce it; and, it being necessary that the facts showing jurisdiction should appear before the judgment is entitled to any standing, when these facts are wanting there is substantially no judgment. A judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, however, stands upon an entirely different footing. Such a judgment prima facie proves itself, and it is not necessary to aid it by proof of any jurisdictional facts. To authorize any of the steps that may be taken to enforce judgments of this kind it is only necessary to produce the judgment itself, as all jurisdictional facts will be presumed until the contrary appears. It is true that, when it is made to appear affirmatively by the record in any particular case that the facts necessary to jurisdiction did not exist, the presumption as to jurisdiction will be overcome; but this cannot make a writing in the form of a judgment, which, until such want of jurisdiction is made affirmatively to appear, is binding upon the whole world, an absolute nullity. The fact that it is the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction makes it prima facie valid, and that which is even prima facie valid cannot be said to be a nullity. When the officer returns as his authority for holding a prisoner a commitment which shows upon its face that such person is committed by a court of general jurisdiction in pursuance of its final judgment for a crime triable by such court, we think he has brought himself within the provisions of our statute, and that the courts are, by the terms thereof, precluded from inquiring further into the cause of detention; and that neither by having the record set out in the petition, nor by bringing it here by certiorari, can this court look therein to see whether or not the court had jurisdiction in that particular case. To hold that we could investigate this question in the face of the statute would be to hold that the judgment was an absolute nullity for all purposes, which we have seen would not be reasonable, and would lead to results which could not be tolerated without an entire change of practice as to the presumptions in favor of the judgments of such courts. If such judgments are nullities, then they can be good for no purpose; and every officer attempting to enforce them would be guilty of trespass or false imprisonment. Yet, so far as we know, no court has thus punished officers for enforcing the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction fair upon its face.

But petitioner contends that, if the statute must be construed as above, it is unconstitutional; his claim being that the writ of habeas corpus is a high prerogative writ known to the common law, and that it is this common-law writ that is secured to us by the constitution of the United States and of this state; and further, that at the common law said writ was used to inquire as to the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the final judgment upon which the petitioner was held. With the first part of this claim we find little fault, though it may need some qualification; but as to the second part we cannot agree that the scope of this writ was as contended for until long after the date when the statute of England ceased to be a part of our common law; and even at this time it is doubtful if the practice there goes to the extent above claimed without some important qualifications. Prior to the passage of the act of 56 Geo. III., the return of the officer was absolutely conclusive; and if he returned that he held the petitioner by virtue of process issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, that was the end of the inquiry, and, however false this return might be, the only remedy was by an action for false return. This being the law and practice in England at the time we took therefrom our common law, it cannot be successfully contended that our statute conflicts therewith, for under it, as we have seen, the return that the petitioner was held by any process or judgment good upon its face not only precluded inquiry into the validity of such process or judgment, but also precluded inquiry as to the facts of his being held by such process or judgment at all. In fact, under the English common law, as we took it, the return of the officer was absolutely conclusive. See Church, Hab. Corp. §§ 138, 221. Many cases have been cited by the petitioner to show that courts will go back of the judgment, and inquire as to the jurisdiction of the court that rendered it. From the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in particular a large number of such cases have been cited. Such cases would be in point were they construing a statute like ours, but such was not the case; on the contrary, the United States statute in force at the time these cases were decided expressly authorized such inquiry. That such cases were entirely controlled by the statute in force at the time is made clear by an examination of the course of the decisions. Prior to the statute of 1833 it was "conceded that a return to this writ, showing an imprisonment under process legal and valid on its face, was conclusive." See Church, Hab. Corp. § 222. Of the cases upon the subject decided by the supreme courts of the different states they are nearly all controlled by statutes different from ours, and therefore not in point. The states of Missouri and Kansas have statutes substantially like ours, and the decisions in those states seem to warrant the contention of the petitioner. The Missouri cases, however, do not seem to have been carefully considered, and are far from satisfactory. But the case of In re Petty, 22 Kan. 477, was a well-considered case, and the court in an elaborate opinion sustains the position of petitioner, both as to the construction of the statute and as to the constitutional question. The court says that the statute cannot be held to speak of a judgment without jurisdiction for the reason that such judgment was a nullity. We have attempted to show that such judgments are not nullities, and, if we have succeeded, it follows that the reasoning of the court was from a wrong basis, and therefore without value. As to the constitutional question, the court was clearly in error as to the rule at common law; and, this being so, its reasoning, however elaborate, could have but little weight. Both of these questions have been decided adversely to the position of the Kansas case by the supreme court of the United States. In the case of Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. 193, that distinguished jurist Chief Justice MARSHALL in an elaborate opinion decided both of these questions, and held that, in the absence of a statute authorizing it, the supreme court could not go behind a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction to inquire as to the fact of jurisdiction in that particular case; and as the habeas corpus provided for in the constitution of the United States was as much the common-law writ as ours is, this case must be held conclusive of the constitutional question; and as the learned judge decides therein that judgments without jurisdiction are not nullities, this case may well be said to be decisive of this entire question. From an examination of all the cases that we have been able to find we think our statute is constitutional, and that under it we are precluded from questioning a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction fair upon its face. This conclusion disposes of the application, and makes it unnecessary to decide the first question above stated; and, as such question will doubtless soon reach us in a case brought here on appeal, wherein it can be more deliberately briefed than it has been here, we think best not to decide it now. The order to show cause must be vacated, and the writ denied.

1. The trial of a cause began in the absence of defendant's principal counsel, with the expectation that he would arrive before any material progress had been made. During the trial, defendant asked for a continuance, on the ground of his absence, stating that grave apprehensions were entertained that he had been drowned, which was subsequently ascertained to be the fact. Plaintiff opposed the continuance on the ground that the absent counsel had refused to participate in the trial because plaintiff had counseled with him before the commencement of the action as to the matters in controversy therein. Held, that the refusal of the trial court to grant the continuance was not such an abuse of discretion as would justify a reversal of the judgment.

2. The refusal of the trial court to permit defendant to amend its answer so as to set up an entirely new defense is not such an abuse of discretion as will justify the reversal of the judgment, where the application was not made until after the close of plaintiff's testimony, and where the granting of the amendment would have necessitated a continuance to enable plaintiff to procure witnesses to meet the new defense.

3. Plaintiff entered into a contract with defendant under which plaintiff was licensed to cut timber on defendant's land at a specified rate of stumpage; defendant to furnish him with supplies during the continuance of the contract. Held, in an action by plaintiff for breach of contract to furnish supplies, that he was entitled to recover expenses incurred by him for repeated trips from his camp to defendant's store, made with a reasonable expectation to get the needed supplies, based on information furnished by defendant; and that plaintiff could not be confined to the expenses of his first trip, though that and all the subsequent ones resulted in a failure to procure the needed supplies.

4. An allegation in the complaint that plaintiff was prevented from carrying on his business by reason of defendant's failure to furnish the supplies is sufficient to render admissible proof that plaintiff had attempted to get supplies from other sources, and that he had failed in such attempts.

5. Where defendant knew, when it entered into the contract, that plaintiff was unable to obtain supplies elsewhere, and that its failure to furnish them would seriously embarrass him in the prosecution of his work, the measure of damages for defendant's failure to furnish the supplies, necessitating plaintiff to run a reduced crew, is the difference between that quantity of logs which he could have produced had defendant furnished all the necessary supplies and the amount of logs actually produced, less the cost of getting out the excess.

6. Where objectionable statements by counsel in the argument to the jury are made under a bona fide belief that they are permissible under the proof, the opposite party, to prevent their repetition or continuance, should call the court's attention to them by objection during the argument; and, where no objection is made until after the close of the argument, the opposite party must be content with an instruction to the jury to disregard such statements.

J. C. Haines, for appellant. Ronald & Piles, for appellee.

SCOTT, J. This action was brought in the district court of the third judicial district of Washington territory, holding terms at Mt. Vernon, by the appellee against the appellant, to recover damages in the sum of $7,575 for an alleged breach of a contract entered into between the appellant and appellee, by which the appellant let to the appellee, for certain terms of years mentioned in said contract, certain lands therein described, and, in consideration of the sum of $1.50 per thousand feet stumpage, sold and gave him license to cut saw-logs, piles, and spars upon said lands during said time; and further agreed to furnish to said appellee at the reasonable market price all the provisions and logging supplies needed by him during the continuance of said contract. The appellee claimed that he entered upon the performance of his part of the contract, and employed a large number of men, purchased a large number of teams, and invested a large amount of money in camp equipage, tools, etc., and in every respect fulfilled all the conditions of the contract on his part; but that during the months of July and August, and the first part of September, 1888, the appellant refused to furnish him logging supplies and provisions, as provided in the contract, and that in consequence of such failure the appellee made 13 trips from his logging camp to the place of business of the appellant at an expense of $195, for the purpose of procuring such supplies; but in consequence of the appellants' failure to furnish them these trips were made useless; and claimed further that during this period, in consequence of appellant's failure to furnish such supplies, the business of the appellee was interrupted, and his teams compelled to remain idle, to his damage in the sum of $450. The appellee claimed further that the appellant failed and refused to supply him with provisions and logging appliances, as provided in said contract, from the 12th day of September, 1888, for a period of six weeks continuously, and that in consequence of such failure the appellee was unable to carry on his business, and was compelled to shut down his camp and suspend his business for a period of six weeks, causing him loss and damage to the amount of $2,000. He claimed further that on the 5th day of June, 1889, at the most advantageous time for logging, the appellant again refused to supply him with provisions and logging appliances as provided in the contract, and notified him it would no longer comply with the terms of its contract, and has ever since failed and refused to do so, and in consequence of such failure the men employed by the appellee abandoned their labors in the camp, and the appellee was unable to procure supplies or subsistence, or to maintain or operate his business to the extent of his ability, and, in place of 45,000 feet of saw-logs per day, which he had been putting into the market, was only able to put in 20,000 feet per day, causing him damage to the extent of $3,000. The appellant joined issue with the appellee upon all the material allegations of the complaint except that of the making of the contract, and the allegation that in the month of June, 1889, it refused to furnish the appellee with supplies and so notified him. The appellant then pleaded in justification of its refusal to furnish supplies to the appellee in June, 1889, two affirmative defenses, setting up in the first defense breach of the contract by the appellee, and in the second defense breach of a subsequent contract entered into between them for the securing of certain acceptances to be made by the appellant of certain orders by the appellee. The appellee joined issues with the appellant upon these defenses. The case was called for trial at Mt. Vernon on December 9, 1889, in the superior court of Skagit county, which had convened December 2d. The trial occupied several days, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for the sum of $3,067.50.

The first ground of error claimed by appellant is that the superior court abused its discretion in refusing to grant a continuance of the cause. Appellant's motion for a continuance was made December 10th, while the trial was in progress, and was based upon the ground that one of its attorneys, Mr. Haller, was not present. Affidavits were filed in support of the motion showing that appellant had made every exertion to have Mr. Haller present; that a few days prior to the convening of said court he had left upon a hunting trip in company with two other gentlemen, none of whom had been definitely heard from for several days, but that it was rumored he, with the others, had been drowned, and the gravest apprehensions were entertained that said rumors were true; that Mr. Haller was the principal attorney for appellant in said matter, and the one upon whom it relied to conduct its defense. (It was subsequently learned that Mr. Haller had, in fact, lost his life as reported.) Counter-affidavits were filed by appellee to the effect that Mr. Haller had said that he would not participate in the trial in consequence of a claim made by appellee that he had counseled with him previous to the commencement of said action as to the matters then in controversy therein; also that on said December 2d appellee notified Mr. Burke, of the firm of Burke & Haller, that said court was in session, and that he intended to have said cause called for trial. The first attorneys who appeared for appellant in the action were Cushing & Dunning, who filed a demurrer to the complaint September 20, 1889. Mr. Cushing was appellant's secretary. On November 23d following, Cushing & Dunning and Burke & Haller filed an answer in the case for appellant, a reply was filed by appellee, and the cause was at issue before the court convened. On December 5th appellant employed Hon. C. H. Hanford, Rochester, Lewis & Gilman, and E. C. Million as attorneys for it in said action, and on December 6th C. E. Patterson was also employed as one of its attorneys therein. It appears that the case was called several times during the first week of the session, and was passed at appellant's request, the last time on December 6th, upon a motion by appellant for a continuance to the first of the following week, which motion was granted, with the understanding that it would be the first civil cause called for trial. No exception was taken to this, appellant then expecting to have Mr. Haller present before said time had expired. It appears that appellant acted in entire good faith in the premises, and made great exertions to learn where Mr. Haller was, and also insisted upon its right to have him heard, if possible, as to the matters stated in appellee's affidavits relating to his intended participation in the trial. Upon Monday of the following week (December 9th) the case was called, and the parties proceeded to trial. No objection was made thereto by appellant, nor did it then apply for a further continuance. It now contends that it was understood when the trial was commenced that it would take several days within which to complete it, and that appellant expected Mr. Haller would arrive before any material progress had been made therein up to December 10th, when the rumors of his drowning became rife, and its said motion for a continuance was made.

The second ground of error alleged is in regard to the refusal of the court to permit the appellant to amend its answer, except in one instance on the condition that it pay the costs accrued, and in the other refusing it entirely. It appears that when the trial was commenced appellant asked and obtained leave to amend the answer in several minor matters. Two subsequent applications to amend were made by it. We are unable to gather from the record what the nature of the amendment was that was asked for in the first of the subsequent applications, but it appears to have been granted with the requirement that appellant should first pay the costs accrued. Appellant refused to accede to the terms, and excepted to that part of the ruling imposing them. Its last motion to amend was founded on section 109 of the Code, and was made after appellee had rested his case. The amended answer itself, which was then tendered, is not to be found in the record; but it appears by the affidavits which were filed in support of the motion therefor that the purpose was to set up another defense, to the effect that appellant was prevented in the summer of 1888 from furnishing the supplies it had contracted to furnish appellee by reason of the extreme and unusual lowness of the water in the Skagit river during said time, so that the same could not be navigated, and that there was no other way of getting such supplies to appellant's store; that its attorneys who were engaged in the trial only knew of this matter a day or two before the commencement thereof; and that they had supposed up to the time of entering upon the defense that the court would permit the proof under the general denial pleaded. Appellee filed affidavits denying any cessation in the navigation of said river during said time, and claimed he could prove that the same was navigable throughout said season, but that in order for him to do so it would be necessary to have the cause continued so that he could procure the attendance or testimony of witnesses from a distance, and that it would be a great hardship to him if the amendment should be permitted. The court, in considering the motion, said if it was granted it would necessitate a continuance; that appellant had had an opportunity to amend under terms and refused to do so, and he would deny the motion; to which appellant excepted.

All of the foregoing alleged errors are in relation to matters which are addressed to the discretion of courts of original jurisdiction, and in some of the states and in the United States courts are regarded as so peculiarly fit for the decision of such courts only that the granting or refusing thereof constitutes no ground for an appeal. Wright v. Hollingsworth, 1 Pet. 168; Henry v. Cannon, 86 N. C. 24; Westfield v. Westfield, 19 S. C. 85. Another practice obtains in many of the states, however, and which we think is the better one, of holding them appealable in so far as to correct an abuse of such discretion. But such abuse must be clearly apparent before an appellate court would be justified in reversing a judgment upon such grounds. Considering all the circumstances connected therewith in this case, we cannot say that the action of the lower court in the premises was erroneous or unreasonable.

Another ground of error complained of is as to the allowance of testimony and recovery of damages for the several trips made by appellee from his logging camp to appellant's store for the purpose of procuring supplies, which trips, he claimed, resulted in failures. Appellant contends that damages could not be recovered for more than one of said trips. Appellee testified that the reason he did not get the supplies upon such occasions was because appellant did not have the goods on hand, but informed him the same were constantly expected, and requested him to come at stated times therefor, and that appellant was disappointed from time to time in getting the expected shipment; that upon some of said trips he got a small portion of the supplies he went after, but that he did not get what he needed, and it was claimed such trips were practically failures. Numerous special findings were made by the jury, from which it appears that but two trips were made upon which no supplies were obtained. The jury allowed damages for eight trips in the sum of $90, as follows: For two, $15 each, and for six, $10 each. No allowance was made for the others claimed to have been made. There having been testimony to show that the trips were made with a reasonable expectation of getting the supplies needed, based upon the information furnished by the appellant, it follows that the fault, if fault there was, cannot be held to have been that of the appellee, and there was no error in this respect.

A further point is urged, that the court erred in permitting appellee to introduce testimony as to his inability to procure the needed supplies elsewhere, on the ground that it was inadmissible under the complaint, it not having been alleged therein that appellee attempted to get such supplies from other sources, and that the only allegation in relation thereto was that he could not procure and pay for the supplies elsewhere. Appellant contends the statement that appellee could not procure and pay for the supplies elsewhere cannot be treated as an allegation that he could not procure them, and this of course is true; but the complaint does allege that the appellee was prevented from carrying on his business by reason of the appellant's failure to furnish the supplies it had contracted to furnish him. While the complaint is somewhat faulty in this particular, it seems to us the appellant was apprised by it that proof of this character was to be offered, and that it did not result in any surprise or injury. It may be fairly understood from the statement—that the appellee was thereby prevented from carrying on his business—that he attempted to procure the supplies from other parties and failed to get them, as that would be the ordinary way of proving such an allegation; and we do not think there was any substantial error here.

Appellant's main contention, however, is as to the damages, if any, appellee was entitled to recover, and this is the most important question in the case. The appellee claimed he should be allowed to recover as damages the value of the logs he could have put in the market during the time after September 12, 1888, when he was compelled to shut down in consequence of appellant's failure to furnish the supplies, less the cost of getting out and handling such logs, and also the value of the logs he could have put in the market in July and August and the first part of September, 1888, and after June 5, 1889, with the full force which he could have operated during said times had the supplies been furnished as contracted, over and above what he did put in with the diminished force, less the cost of getting out and handling such excess. Appellant contends that such damages or profits were too remote, conjectural, and uncertain to be estimated; that the same depended upon the continuing ability of the men and teams engaged to perform the same amount of labor; that the weather should remain the same and the market price unchanged; that such damages could be allowed, if at all, only in those cases where there was a stipulation in the contract that the other party should take the proceeds of such labor for a price certain, or where the disposition thereof was provided for by a collateral contract of which the other party had knowledge at the time of entering into the original contract, or where the thing contracted for was to be furnished for a particular purpose, and so understood; and that in the present case the measure of damages could only be the increased price and extra expense, if any, in procuring the supplies in the market; that the contract provided for nothing more, and that nothing else could be held to have been within the contemplation of the parties. The appellee claimed he had a right to show the known situation of the parties at the time of contracting; the object they had in entering therein; that he was unable to get such supplies from any other source, and that appellant knew thereof when contracting with him. Appellant objected to such testimony upon the grounds that there was no allegation in the complaint that appellant knew appellee could not procure the supplies elsewhere; that the contract itself was the best evidence of what the parties contemplated; and for the reason that it was immaterial. The court allowed the testimony, from which it appeared that appellant was engaged in the mercantile business on the Skagit river; that it was carrying an extensive stock of merchandise, and owned large areas of timber lands bordering on said river; that a part of its business was to make money out of its timber, and from its store in furnishing supplies to persons engaged in cutting and hauling timber, and to this end appellant sought to create a market and a demand for its timber and the merchandise; that appellee was an experienced logger, and made logging his business, but that he was financially unable to undertake logging on an extensive scale, and would have to be carried in an undertaking like the present one; that this was known and contemplated by both parties in entering into the contract. The contract itself provided that the supplies should be furnished upon credit, and that appellant should have a preference lien on all the logs and timber cut to secure it for the amounts that should be due for stumpage and supplies, and it bound the appellee to purchase all of his supplies from the appellant during the continuance of the contract, and provided that such indebtedness should be paid out of the proceeds of such logs and timber by the purchasers at the time of purchase. An addendum to the contract provided that after appellee should pay all indebtedness to appellant, and wished to purchase goods for cash, appellant would sell him goods for cash as cheaply as he could purchase elsewhere, and, in case appellant refused to do so, appellee should then be at liberty to purchase in the open market. There was testimony to show that the logs and timber had a general market value, and what that value was; also the number of feet appellee actually got out, and the proportionate additional amount he could have gotten out during the times provided for in the contract had he been furnished with the necessary supplies as agreed upon; and testimony as to the cost of getting out and hauling the logs, and the amount of profit that would have been realized thereon. One of the instructions given by the court to the jury upon the subject of damages was substantially as follows, (one paragraph relating to damage claimed by reason of a forced sale of cattle, upon which no point is made, being omitted:.) "In this case, that you may arrive at a just verdict, you will consider from the evidence the situation of the parties at the time they entered into the contract as known to each other, and the object they had in entering into the same as made known one to the other, and if you find from a fair preponderance of the testimony that the defendant knew at the time it entered into the contract with the plaintiff that the plaintiff was unable to carry out the terms of his contract unless defendant would supply him the provisions and supplies needed by the plaintiff mentioned in the contract, and, so knowing, it allowed plaintiff to enter upon the land mentioned in the contract, and to construct thereon extensive logging roads and other improvements, to purchase teams, tools, etc., necessary to successfully carry on said logging business, and that plaintiff did actually construct or cause to be constructed extensive logging roads upon said premises, and purchased teams, tools, etc., for said purpose, and that the parties to said contract entered into said contract for the purpose of making profits, and after plaintiff had expended considerable means in preparing and constructing logging roads, and placed the premises in good condition to be successfully and profitably logged, the defendant, without any legal excuse or justification, committed a breach of the contract by refusing to supply plaintiff with reasonable and necessary supplies to carry on said business, and that plaintiff was prevented thereby from continuing his business, or that his business was run in a reduced state, so that he was prevented from producing the same quantity of logs that he had under the same circumstances produced immediately prior to the time the defendant refused to furnish the supplies. If you find it did refuse so to do, without any legal excuse or justification,—then I instruct you that the measure of damages in this case is the value, at plaintiff's camp in Skagit county, of that quantity of logs which represents the difference between what plaintiff would have produced had the defendant furnished all necessary supplies as alleged and claimed by the plaintiff and the amount of logs actually produced by said plaintiff, besides such special damage, if any, plaintiff sustained by reason of certain alleged trips he made for supplies. The jury will estimate the number of days, if any, which plaintiff's camp was shut down by reason of the alleged failure of the defendant to comply with the contract during 1888, and, having so estimated this time, the jury will estimate the value at plaintiff's camp at said time of such quantity of logs, if any, which the plaintiff would have produced at plaintiff's landing during the time that plaintiff was so compelled to shut down; and if you find that plaintiff was compelled by reason of the alleged breach of contract by the defendant to operate and run his camp, during any time in 1889, upon a reduced or diminished scale from that which he would have operated and run the same had such alleged breach not occurred, the jury will then estimate the time during which the camp was operated by the plaintiff upon said reduced scale. And I charge you that, if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff has been damaged at this last-mentioned time by reason of the alleged breach of contract on the part of defendant, that you will arrive at the measure of damages as follows: Having found the time he was compelled to operate said camp on a diminished scale, you will then find the quantity of logs, if any, which plaintiff would have produced at his landing had said alleged default in said contract not occurred, and from this quantity so ascertained by you you will deduct the quantity of logs actually produced at said place by defendant during the time he was so compelled to operate upon said reduced scale, and the value at the plaintiff's landing in said county of the difference between these two quantities thus ascertained will be the measure of damages which the plaintiff sustained by reason of said breach of said contract, if any he did sustain."

In addition to its other objections as to the measure of damages, appellant argues that this instruction was erroneous upon two other grounds: First, that it, in effect, allowed appellee to recover pay twice for his time in making the futile trips for supplies; in also allowing him pay for what he could have done in the way of getting out logs during said time had the supplies been furnished and the trips not have been made; second, that the jury was not instructed to deduct the cost of producing the excess which it was claimed could have been gotten out but for the fault of appellant, from the value of such excess. As appellant did not assign the first point as error in its brief, but only called attention to it in the oral argument, and as we are not entirely satisfied from what we have been able to gather from the record that the output of logs would have been necessarily diminished by the absence of the person and team engaged in making the trips, we will not disturb the verdict in the premises. The second point is disposed of by another instruction, where the court told the jury that the cost of getting out the excess should be deducted, and by the fact that the jury did deduct the cost thereof from the value of such logs, as appears by their special findings.

As to the inadmissibility of the evidence objected to under the pleadings, while the complaint did not contain a direct allegation that appellant knew the appellee was unable to procure supplies elsewhere, it did contain the following statement: "That, at the time of purchasing said timber from the said defendant as aforesaid, plaintiff, for want of sufficient means, was unable to employ and pay a requisite number of men and to purchase the extra number of teams and tools necessary for plaintiff to have to enter upon said described premises and to make logging roads thereon so as to transport said timber to market, and to purchase a sufficient supply of goods, wares, and merchandise to enable plaintiff to carry on so extensive a logging business and remove said timber from said described premises during the limited period aforesaid; and in order to induce the said plaintiff to purchase said timber from the said defendant, and to induce the said plaintiff to remove the said timber from the said premises aforesaid within the respective periods of time aforesaid, and in consideration of the said plaintiff's purchasing said timber and agreeing to remove the same within the time aforesaid, the said defendant then and there contracted and agreed to and with the said plaintiff to furnish plaintiff with the means with which to employ and pay men, purchase teams, tools, etc., to properly conduct and carry on said business, and to sell, furnish, and deliver to said plaintiff all the provisions and logging supplies needed by said plaintiff upon credit." There was testimony also to show that the parties had transacted business with each other before entering into this contract, and appellant's vice-president testified that at the time the contract was made appellant knew Cole had no money, and that it would have to back him in the enterprise, and knew he could not get along without such assistance. From all the circumstances connected with this matter we are satisfied appellant did not sustain any injury therein.

As to the basis upon which appellee was entitled to recover damages, a long list of authorities was presented by each party, which it is difficult, if not impossible, to harmonize. The position taken by appellee and sanctioned by the superior court is sustained by a number of cases very similar to this one. If the appellant, when it entered into this contract, knew that the appellee was unable to obtain these supplies elsewhere, and that he could not carry on the undertaking without its assistance, and knew when it ceased furnishing the same that the result would be to compel appellee to abandon the enterprise, or seriously to embarrass him in the further execution thereof, it must be held to have contemplated the direct and presumable results of its own wrongful act, and to be answerable in damages therefor. Nor do we think the damages too uncertain or conjectural to be estimated, within the trend of the better authorities. The trees were there from which the logs, spars, and piles could be manufactured; and, at the time of the breaches, there was the benefit of past experience—the known results of previous efforts in carrying on the work—from which to form an estimate of what could have been done thereafter had the supplies been furnished. The timber itself when gotten out was a staple commodity, with a market value not subject to any sudden or great fluctuation, and this value was easily susceptible of proof. Indeed, some of the cases go to a much greater extent than it is necessary to go in this case to sustain the rule of damages adopted at the trial. Of the authorities presented upon the question of damages we cite the following as supporting this case: Shepard v. Gas-Light Co., 15 Wis. 349; Booth v. Rolling-Mill Co., 60 N. Y. 487; Richardson v. Chynoweth, 26 Wis. 656; Hammer v. Schoenfelder, 47 Wis. 455, 2 N. W. Rep. 1129; Crescent Manu'g Co. v. N. O. Nelson Manu'g Co., 100 Mo. 325, 13 S. W. Rep. 503; Houser v. Pearce, 13 Kan. 104; Benj. Sales, § 870; 1 Suth. Dam. pp. 75, 90, 91, 106–116.

A further error is claimed, that counsel for appellee prejudiced the jury against appellant by repeatedly applying harsh and opprobrious epithets to it in his closing argument, which abusive language it is claimed was in no wise warranted by the evidence. It seems that no objection was made thereto at the immediate time, but at the close of the argument appellant excepted to the court's permitting said statements to be made, whereupon the court immediately said to the jury that the language was uncalled for, and should under no circumstances affect them or the case, and subsequently reiterated the same in his instructions. Appellant urges that it is the court's duty to supervise the making of an argument, and that it should in this case of its own motion have prevented counsel from repeating the statements complained of, without an objection by appellant; that it is not the correct practice for counsel to interrupt another at such a time. Appellee insists that all he did say was fully justified and called for by the testimony, notwithstanding the court's remarks to the contrary to the jury, and, if it was not, that it was waived by a failure to object at the time. In the view we take of the matter it is not necessary to set forth the statements or to examine the evidence to see whether the same were excusable. Some latitude must be allowed counsel in arguing to the jury. However, the court should without an objection prevent counsel from clearly transgressing all reasonable limits therein; yet, as here, where the statements were made under an apparent bona fide belief that they were permissible under the proof, if appellant desired to prevent a repetition or continuation thereof it should at least once have called the court's attention thereto by an objection during the argument, otherwise it must be content with the action of the court, when the objection was made, in its doing all it could to prevent the language from having an adverse effect to appellant upon the jury. Judgment affirmed.

ANDERS, C.J., and DUNBAR and STILES, JJ., concur.

HOYT, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to agree with the conclusions of the majority of the court as to most of the questions presented by this record; but, as no good purpose would be subserved by an extended discussion of the reasons which control my judgment, I shall content myself with a brief review of two of the many points presented.

First. As to the ruling on defendant's motion for a continuance. On the 10th day of December, 1889, defendant filed the affidavit of its secretary, substantially as follows: "Eugene B. Cushing, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the secretary of the defendant corporation, and, as such officer, is familiar with the business of said corporation; that at the time of the bringing of the above entitled action he retained G. Morris Haller to defend said corporation, with the understanding that he was to have the sole and exclusive conduct and management of this suit, and was to prepare all the pleadings, investigate the testimony, and in every way to prepare the defense to said suit; that upon the settlement of the pleadings plaintiff's counsel objected to the appearance of Mr. Haller in this case on the ground that he had expressed some opinion with relation to some paper or document involved in this suit; that upon a full consultation between Mr. Haller and Judge Burke, his partner, and this affiant, it was decided that there was nothing whatever that could or should in any way prevent Mr. Haller from continuing in the case for the defense, and he then and there promised this affiant that he would do so; and since that time, to-wit, about the 10th of November last, affiant again saw Mr. Haller, and told him that if there was any doubt about his being able to try this case to be sure to let affiant know so that he could secure other counsel; and that then and there Mr. Haller assured affiant that he need have no anxiety about the matter, for he should attend promptly to the case, and in every way care for the interests of the defendant corporation, and would duly notify affiant when the case would be ready for trial, so as to enable him to have his testimony ready and the defendant's witnesses all present; that, relying upon these promises of Mr. Haller, affiant took no further steps in this matter, and that the first notice that this affiant had that the case was ready or would be called for trial at this term of this court was a telegram which he received from Mr. V. A. Marshall on last Thursday night, December 5, 1889, announcing that this case was set for trial, and that Mr. Haller was not present; that thereupon affiant telegraphed Mr. Haller to know if he was attending to the case, and received an answer from Judge Thomas Burke, his partner, that he was absent from home, and he could not state where he was or when he would return; that thereupon affiant telegraphed Judge Burke that the defendant was taken wholly and completely by surprise, and was in no manner prepared for trial, and asked him to telegraph the court at Mt. Vernon explaining the facts, and to ask a continuance until such time as the defendant could get ready and proceed to trial with safety; that thereafter affiant received a telegram from V. A. Marshall on the night of Saturday, December 7, 1889, saying that the court would not grant a continuance, and for affiant to come to Mt. Vernon immediately; that thereupon affiant took the first possible conveyance, and arrived at Mt. Vernon Monday afternoon, December 9, 1889, after the trial of this case had commenced; that affiant is credibly informed that Morris G. Haller, aforesaid, started upon a hunting trip about two weeks ago with the avowed intention of returning in a few days, and of being present at this term of the court to attend to such cases as he was counsel in, and affiant is further credibly informed that the friends of Mr. Haller are now greatly alarmed about his safety, and express great fears that he may have lost his life, as his long absence and continued silence are so much at variance with his expressed determination to return in a few days. Affiant further states that defendant has made no preparation whatever for the trial of this cause, having relied wholly upon Mr. Haller to inform it when to take the necessary steps, which information it has never received; and affiant states that to be compelled to continue the trial of this cause at the present time would be unjust and oppressive, and work irreparable injury and hardships to defendant. Affiant further states that defendant should be given a reasonable time in which to acquaint counsel with the facts in this case, which involves a long period of time, to-wit, about four years, and the investigation of long and complicated accounts, and involving a very large sum of money, to-wit, more than fifteen thousand dollars. And affiant further states that, at the time he retained the said G. Morris Haller, he, the said affiant, made a full, true, and complete statement of the facts constituting the defense in this action, and that then and there his said counsel advised him that said defendant corporation has a full and complete defense to said action, all of which said affiant did then and does now verily believe to be true. And affiant states that the defendant has in no manner been negligent in this behalf, but has used every effort and diligence to be prepared for the trial of this case when it should be called for trial." This affidavit was corroborated by several other affidavits, and was absolutely uncontradicted, for though in the affidavits filed in opposition to the motion certain statements of said Haller and of his partner were set out, yet there was absolutely no proof that the intentions of said Haller or Burke, as stated by them, had ever been in any way communicated to any of the officers or agents of said defendant. After examining all of the affidavits filed I have been unable to find that there was any substantial dispute as to the facts stated in the affidavit above set forth. This affidavit was supported by those of all the attorneys of said defendant present at the trial, to the effect that they were not prepared to try the case, and that the rights of the defendant could only be protected by a continuance of the cause. In addition to the above it appeared, before the question of continuance was finally disposed of, that the said Haller had been drowned on or about December 2d. On this showing I think that the motion for continuance should have been granted. The object of the law and of the institution of courts is that there may be a fair trial and a right determination of all alleged causes of action, and whenever this court is satisfied that, by the action of the lower court, a party has been deprived of the opportunity to fairly present his cause, it should order a new trial. I think the facts proved upon such motion for continuance show that without it the cause could not be fairly tried, and that therefore there should be a new trial.

Second. As to the rule of damages authorized by the contract as applied to the facts proven upon the trial. The conditions of the contract which bear upon this question are vague and indefinite, and it might well be held thereunder that no breach could be assigned thereon. There was an absolute want of the usual conditions of exactness and certainty. The agreement simply provided on the one part that supplies should be furnished, and on the other part that they should be accepted and paid for, but as to the amount of such supplies, or the time when or place where they should be thus furnished and accepted, the contract was entirely silent. If these conditions could be enforced at all they must be mutual. Now, suppose the plaintiff had made up his mind not to take the supplies of the defendant, and the defendant had decided to bring an action to compel such taking or to recover damages, could it maintain such action? If it could not, then it must follow that the plaintiff could not successfully allege a breach of such conditions. It is not necessary for the purposes of this discussion that I should come to a conclusion as to the above inquiry, as from my interpretation of the contract the measure of damages adopted by the lower court was wrong, even if the contract was held to be sufficiently certain to support an action for the breach thereof. There was nothing in the contract or in the proof at the trial to show that any of the supplies contemplated by the contract could not be obtained in the open market, and therefore the general rule as to damages would be the difference between the contract price and the price in the open market; and, there being in this case no contract price other than the market price, there could be no damage. It is claimed, however, that the contract, when viewed in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time it was entered into, as disclosed by the proof, shows that the parties clearly contemplated other than the usual responsibility in regard to such furnishing of supplies by the defendant. I am unable to see that this claim has any foundation, as the plain conditions of the contract show that the agreement to furnish and take the supplies in question was mutual, and that the defendant was as much moved to enter into the contract by the agreement of the plaintiff to get his supplies of it as the plaintiff was by its agreement to furnish the same. But if it is conceded that said contract was all that the plaintiff claimed, and that thereunder the defendant became an absolute warrantor that such supplies would be furnished as stated therein, yet the measure of damages adopted seems to me to be wrong. The defendant had no control over the magnitude of the operations of the plaintiff, and had not contracted to supply any particular grade or kind of camp; and the simple fact that the plaintiff had established his enterprise upon a particular scale would no more compel the defendant to supply that particular scale than any other; and if the rule of damages laid down in this case is sustained, the plaintiff could have doubled the amount of his recovery by having instituted his enterprise on a scale as large again as he did. If the defendant was liable for the loss of prospective profits growing out of the reduction of his force from 40 to 20 men, he would have been likewise liable if the force had been reduced from 80 to 10 men. It seems to me impossible that the parties could have contemplated such a construction of the contract that the damages for a breach thereof could thus be increased or decreased at the will of one party without the act or consent of the other. I shall not attempt to review the cases cited by the majority of the court more than to say that I have carefully examined them all, and I do not think any of them sustain the doctrine approved in this case. If the contract as to supplies was enforceable at all, the highest measure of damages that could be sustained, upon any theory of the case, would be the actual loss suffered by reason of a breach thereof; and of this actual loss prospective profits could form no part. Such actual loss would, in ordinary cases, be the difference between what the supplies were to be furnished at and what it cost to procure them elsewhere. But if it appeared that it was known to the parties that it would be impossible for the plaintiff to get the supplies elsewhere by reason of want of money or credit, and in the light of such knowledge the defendant supplied plaintiff and allowed him to incur large expense by way of making roads, etc., in anticipation of getting in logs under the contract, and then, knowing these facts, refused to supply him longer, defendant should, for such refusal, be held liable to plaintiff for the money thus expended by him in the prosecution of the enterprise, less any sums he had received on account thereof. Even if the rule of damages approved by the majority of the court is correct upon the facts found it could not avail plaintiff, for the reason that the complaint is insufficient to authorize the introduction of proof as to the knowledge of defendant of the condition of plaintiff. In my opinion the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 11, 1891.)

LABORERS' LIENS—STREET RAILWAYS.

Under Code Wash. c. 138, § 1957, giving a laborers' lien upon a "railroad" or "any other structure," and the land upon which it is erected, laborers cannot have a lien upon a street cable railway, since there can be no lien upon the land, the fee of the street being in the city.

STILES, J. The decree from which this appeal was taken established that the appellees were entitled to the foreclosure of their numerous liens upon the cable railway of the appellant on Front and other streets, in the city of Seattle, and the power-house connected with the railway, and the machinery connected with the power-house, and ordered the sale of the same or so much thereof as might be necessary to raise the amount due the appellees. The liens thus adjudicated had been filed against the railway, etc., for labor performed at the instance of a subcontractor in connection with the construction of the concrete road-bed laid in the streets for the reception of the rails. Numerous questions growing out of the lien statutes of this state were pertinently raised by the record, but underlying all the others is that as to whether a lien can be maintained upon a street railway under chapter 138 of the Code. With this point resolved in the affirmative, we should be required to review the case further; but if it is decided in the negative, the judgment establishing the lien and ordering a sale must be reversed. Section 1957 specifies the structures upon which an unpaid laborer may have a lien. One of these is a "railroad;" another is, "any other structure." The lien is given upon the structure, and the land upon which it is erected, and, unless there can be a lien upon the land, there can be none upon the structure. This position was taken in the case of Kellogg v. Manufacturing Co., ante, 461, (decided at the last session of this court.) Therefore, to authorize a lien in the case of a street railway, it would be necessary that the person who caused the railway to be constructed have some estate in the land over which it was laid. This it could not have, as the fee of the streets of Seattle is in the city for the public use, the general public having the easement of use, and the municipal authorities having power to grant only a license to street-railway builders to occupy and use, as a part of the public easement, such portions of the streets as is necessary to the operation of their cars. Acts 1885-86, p. 244. The street railway company owns the structure laid by it on the highway, and a franchise to collect fares. Pierce, R. R.

252. The license of the street-railway company is not a distinct easement. Attorney General v. Railroad Co., 125 Mass. 515. And it creates no additional burden upon the land for which abutting owners are entitled to compensation, unless there are special reasons therefor. Elliott, Roads & S. 558; Mills, Em. Dom. § 205; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 124; Ror. R. R. 1425. Being unable to find, therefore, that a street railway is such a "structure" as the statute contemplates, the conclusion follows that the right of the lien does not exist. We deem it to be a clear proposition, also, that these "railways" are not "railroads," according to the usual and ordinary meaning of the word, to which reference must be had for the interpretation of a statute. The difference between these two valuable instruments of public convenience was clearly pointed out in the earlier days of street railways, in a contest for the possession of some of the streets of the city of Louisville, Ky., between a railroad company and a street-railway company. The case reported is that of Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Louisville City Ry. Co., 2 Duv. 175. The legislature of Kentucky, in 1860, in furtherance of a certain railroad enterprise in which the state had an interest, enacted that "no other railroad" should be constructed in certain streets in the city of Louisville. Later, a street-railway company was organized, and, under license from the city of Louisville, commenced to lay its tracks on some of the streets mentioned in the act of 1860. The railroad company sought to enjoin the new company, on the ground that its rights under the act of 1860 were being violated. This brought up the question whether the street railways proposed to be built were "railroads," within the meaning of the statute, and the Kentucky court of appeals, holding them not to be, refused the injunction. In its decision the court said: "A 'railroad' and a 'street railroad' or 'way' are, in both their technical and popular import, as distinct and different things as a 'road' and a 'street,' or as a 'bridge' and a 'railroad bridge.'"
 • • • A street railway is not, in either the popular or legislative sense, a railroad." This case is cited with apparent approval in 2 Ror. R. R. p. 1422, and in Elliott, Roads & S. p. 558, and we agree with the views there expressed. For these reasons the decree must be reversed as to the appellant, and the cause as against it dismissed. And it is so ordered. Costs to appellant.

HOYT, J., did not sit at the hearing of this cause, he being disqualified.

SCOTT, J., (dissenting.) I concur in the result as to all the appellees excepting Brown and Johnson, on the ground that except as to these two there was no proof by the lienors that their claims had not been paid. I think that in a case like this, where the claimants had contracted and dealt with another than the owner of the property in relation to the matters out of which their claims arose, the burden of proof was upon them to show that the respective sums claimed were still due and owing them, as these were matters as to which the owner might and probably would have no knowledge, and that such circumstances are sufficient to take it out of the general rule in relation to the proof of payments. While payment is usually an affirmative defense, yet, where the property of a third person is attempted to be taken by operation of law to satisfy a claim against another party, the plaintiff should prove all facts necessary to entitle him to the relief prayed for. Lien claimants are required to swear that the amount claimed is justly due in order to obtain a lien, and they should also be required to prove their claim at the trial in cases like this. I can see no reason why a lien cannot be had and enforced on a street railway, including such franchise or right of way as may be connected therewith in the use of the street itself, under chapter 138 of the Code, without any strained construction or interpretation of its provisions; and the case of Kellogg v. Manufacturing Co., ante, 461, cited, does not conflict therewith. The company certainly had the right to operate its road on the streets where it was laid. It would not be contended that a lien cannot be had on a building erected by a lessee on leased land, together with the right of the lessee in the land itself, in so far as the same should be necessary to the use of the building, where the lessee had the right to erect and use the building, and there is little difference in principle between such a case and this one. As to Brown and Johnson, I think the judgment should have been affirmed.

STOWE v. STATE.

 COSTS IN CRIMINAL CASES—LIABILITIES OF COUNTIES—CRIMINAL CASES—STENOGRAPHERS' FEES.

1. Const. Wash. art. 1, § 23, which provides that in no instance shall a defendant in a criminal case, "before final judgment," be compelled to advance money or fees to secure his rights, has reference to the judgment of the trial court, and not to the judgment of the supreme court on appeal; and hence one convicted of a crime cannot compel the county commissioners to pay the stenographer's fees for the purpose of enabling him to perfect his appeal to the supreme court.

2. Under Code Wash. § 2673, which requires the board of county commissioners to allow all accounts legally chargeable against such county not otherwise provided for, and which intrusts them with the management of the county funds, the county commissioners cannot be compelled, for the benefit of defendant in a criminal case, to pay for a copy of the stenographer's report of the trial.

Appeal from superior court, Pierce county.

Frank L. Kuhn and A. R. Hellig, for appellant. W. H. Snell, Pros. Atty., for the State.

DUNBAR, J. The defendant, upon the information of the prosecuting attorney of Pierce county, was tried for the murder of Enoch Crosby, and on April 25, 1890, found guilty of murder in the second degree. On May 17, 1890, he presented his motion for new trial, based upon errors of the court, newly discovered evidence, and that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, which motion was overruled, and defendant, on same day, sentenced to imprisonment in the state penitentiary for 20 years. On June 11, 1890, his attorneys gave notice, in open court, of appeal to the supreme court of the state, which was duly entered upon the journal. Defendant's attorneys on the same day served the prosecuting attorney with notice that on June 23, 1890, they would appear before the judge that had tried the case, for the purpose of settling a statement of facts to be transmitted with the transcript of the cause to the supreme court. On the 16th day of June, 1890, defendant's attorneys presented and filed his petition setting forth that in order to prosecute his appeal it was necessary to make a transcript of the testimony, rulings, and charge of the court given at the trial a part of the statement of facts; that these were taken in shorthand by the official reporter of said court, and no long-hand transcript had been made thereof; that the reporter refused, on demand, to furnish a long-hand transcript thereof unless he was paid the sum of $100 in advance as part of his fees for making such transcript; that defendant had no means whatever, and could not procure the money to pay said sum; and praying the court to make an order directing the county commissioners of Pierce county to pay or advance said sum in payment of said fees. But the court, on the 16th of June, 1890, entered an order denying the prayer of the defendant, and refused to grant him the relief prayed for; to which order defendant on same day excepted, and exception was allowed. From this order defendant appealed, and gave notice of appeal in open court, June 23, 1890.

Appellant bases his claim upon section 22, art. 1, of the constitution of Washington, which reads as follows: "In criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person and by counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him; to have a copy thereof; to testify in his own behalf; to meet the witnesses face to face; to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his own behalf; to have a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed; and the right to appeal in all cases; and in no instance shall any accused person, before final judgment, be compelled to advance money or fees to secure the rights herein granted;" and argues that the "final judgment," mentioned in said section, means the final judgment of the supreme court instead of the trial court.

We do not think this position tenable. By an inspection of the section cited it will be seen that all the rights and privileges guaranteed to the defendant are rights and privileges necessarily antecedent to the judgment in the trial court; and although the right to appeal in all cases is guaranteed, construing all the provisions of the section together, it is clear that the qualification, "before final judgment," refers to the final judgment in the trial court, and that the interjection of the words, "and the right to appeal in all cases," is simply an announcement in the declaration of rights of the right of appeal. Again, as is forcibly argued by the prosecuting attorney, if the words, "final judgment," mean that judgment from which there is no appeal, the expression is meaningless; for after that judgment there is nothing more to be done for which fees or money could be demanded; and that in order to give force to the language at all, it must be construed to mean the final judgment of the trial court.

We do not think the county commissioners could, by virtue of section 2673<sup>1</sup> of the Code, or by any other provision of the law, be compelled to pay for a copy of a stenographer's report of a trial for the benefit of the defendant. There is no law compelling the state or county to employ a stenographer at all. Sometimes they are employed by the state, sometimes by the defense, and frequently criminal cases are tried without a stenographer; but, whenever one is employed, his services belong exclusively to his employer. If such a claim as this were allowed it would be difficult to limit the demands of defendants in criminal actions on the county treasury. We think there was no error in refusing to grant the relief prayed for in the petition. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1891.)

ACCOUNT STATED—ITEMS—REASONABLE TIME—INSTRUCTION.

1. An account stated can only be opened for fraud, error, or mistake; and the fraud, error, or mistake relied upon must be set forth in the answer.

2. An account rendered, which has at the end the usual initials "E. & O. E.," will become a stated account if not objected to within a reasonable time, with like effect, in every respect, as if it did not contain those initials.

3. An account rendered, which begins on the debit side to balance, without giving the items which constituted such balance, when accounts are rendered annually between the parties, and such balance is brought forward from last year's balances, will become a stated account if not objected to within a reasonable time.

4. What is a reasonable time, when the facts are undisputed, is a question of law.

5. In an action upon an account stated, when it appears that the same had been rendered and forwarded by mail by the creditor to the debtor, residing in the same state, about six months before any objections were made thereto, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury, if requested, that said account became a stated account.

<sup>1</sup> This section provides, inter alia, that these several boards of county commissioners are authorized and required (5) to allow all accounts legally chargeable against such county not otherwise provided for; (6) to have the care of the county property and the management of the county funds.

This is an action to recover the sum of $971.18 on an account stated. The defendants had judgment in the court below, and the plaintiffs have appealed. The testimony tended to show that plaintiffs were wholesale merchants, doing business in Portland, Or., and the defendants retail merchants, doing business as partners in Jackson county, Or. That dealings between the parties covered a period of seven or eight years. That during that time the plaintiffs furnished the defendants with several statements of account. The first was dated June 1, 1883, and showed a balance of $2,148.69 in favor of the plaintiffs; the second was dated December 26, 1885, and showed a balance in favor of the plaintiffs of $3,483.66; the third was dated December 20, 1886, and showed a balance in favor of the plaintiffs for $3,693.16; the fourth, dated December 20, 1887, and showed a balance of $1,606.01 in favor of the plaintiffs; the fifth, dated February 10, 1888, and showed a balance of $971.78 in plaintiffs' favor. Statement No. 2 contained an item of interest of $420.80; No. 3, an item of interest of $251.74; No. 4, an item of interest of $240.60. At the end of each statement were the letters "E. & O. E." The only objections which defendants ever made to any of these statements prior to August 27, 1888, are in the following letters addressed by the defendants to plaintiffs: "Applegate, Feb'y 7, 1888. Mess. Fleischner, Mayer & Co., Portland, Oregon—Gents: Would you kindly send us statement in full of all our dealings in order to make a settlement. Also please explain why your statements do not show a credit to us of $3.75 error on mdse. invoice, June 23d, '83. Also why our a/c is charged with cash, Nov. 23, '83, ($58.74.) Our books show no such item. Respectfully, KUBIL & BOLT." The corrections suggested in this letter were promptly made by the plaintiffs. On the 14th day of February, 1888, the defendants sent the following letter to plaintiffs with a remittance: "Applegate, Feb'y 14, 1888. Mess. Fleischner, Mayer & Co., Portland, Oregon—Gents: Inclosed please find check on First National Bank for fifty-eight and 65-100 dollars, which you will please credit Kubil & Bolt. Oblige, yours, respectfully, KUBIL & BOLT." On the 27th day of August, 1888, the defendants sent the following communication to the plaintiffs, after being again pressed to pay the balance of the account: "Applegate, August 27, 1888. Messrs. Fleischner, Mayer & Co., Portland, Oregon—Gents: Referring to your letter inclosing statements of a/c we would say that, according to our books and your statement we have paid our a/c in full. The balance shown by your statements is interest, and interest upon interest. As your salesman sold us goods upon our own time, and as we never agreed or promised to pay any interest whatsoever, we are surprised to receive your statement with request to remit. Respectfully, KUBIL & BOLT."

ner, Mayer & Co. in 1881. That about that time a stranger, claiming to be Mark A. Mayer, a son of one of the members of the firm of Fleischner, Mayer & Co., and claiming to be a partner of the concern, wished to sell me goods. Was then dealing in San Francisco. Was in debt considerably then, and couldn't very well deal with Fleischner, Mayer & Co. Mayer told me that if we dealt with them we could have all the time we wanted to pay without interest, and without any dunning letters. Finally he offered me goods very low, reasonable, and I bought a bill of goods of him. We continued business right along. They sent us accounts and statements right along, a great many of them. I never remember of having made any direct response to them. Whenever we could spare money we sent it to them." That he understood the letters "E. & O. E." to mean that it gave either party the right to correct any errors. (Witness here identified certain statements, and plaintiffs admitted they were the ones sent.) "When I received the statement I did not think it necessary to reply particularly. When I received the statement of February 10, 1888, I was on my ranch on Humboldt, sick in bed, about three-quarters of a mile from my former place of business, having gone out of the mercantile business about two months before." This witness also produced and submitted in evidence the following letter from the plaintiffs: "Portland, Oregon, Aug. 31, 1888. Mess. Kubil & Bolt, Applegate, Oregon—Dear Sirs: We are in receipt of yours of 27th. Contents noted. We are very much surprised, indeed, that you should raise any question as to the balance due on your account, and especially that you should at this late day make any objection to the interest. It is our invariable rule to charge interest on all overdue accounts, and in doing so we only get back a portion of the large amount of interest that we have to pay the banks in order that we may be enabled to extend to you and other customers the accommodation they require. In your case we have charged interest after six months' time on all your bills, which is certainly a long credit. When you take into consideration the fact that the interest charged covers a period of seven (7) years' business, you must admit that the amount is not unreasonable, and it certainly only partially reimburses us for what we have paid out in interest in order that we might accommodate you. We have sent you statements from time to time, with interest charged thereon, and have your acknowledgment that you have received the same; and at no time in all these years have you ever made the slightest objection to the interest charged. We are certainly entitled to the balance due us as per statement rendered, and must insist upon your remitting in settlement of same; otherwise we shall be compelled to send the account to an attorney for collection. Hoping to hear from you promptly, we remain, very truly, yours, FLEISCHNER, MAYER & CO." The witness, after introducing another letter from plaintiffs, continued: "Since [the date of last letter] I have never received any other statement or letter. I think my partner, Mr. Kubli, did, just before this suit was commenced. I have met a member of the firm. It was when Mr. Mark A. Mayer sold us the first bill of goods. After that it was traveling men. No member of the firm informed me personally that they would charge first interest, or change first agreement in relation to selling us goods." On his cross-examination the witness' attention was called to each statement, and he admitted they were received by the defendants, and that no objections were made thereto. The following letter, written by the defendants to plaintiffs, was identified by this witness and offered in evidence by plaintiffs: "Applegate, Oregon, Mar. 30, 1886. Messrs. Fleischner, Mayer & Co., Portland, Oregon—Gentlemen: Your communication of the 25 inst., asking for a remittance, received, and will say that we will dispose of some cattle by April 20th, when we will remit without fail. Thanking you for your long patience, we are, yours, respectfully, KUBLI & BOLT."

The court among others gave the jury the following instructions: "(4) What is such reasonable time is, in this case, a question for the jury. It is for you to say, gentlemen. In determining that question, you must take into consideration all of the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Among other things, the distance between Portland, the place where the plaintiffs reside, and Applegate post-office, or Applegate, the place where the defendants reside, or where the firm, —I don't know particularly where the defendants reside; but where the firm Kubli & Bolt did business at that time. You will also take into consideration the mail connections between those two places, namely, Portland and Applegate,—the facilities they had of communicating by mail to each other. You will also take into consideration the previous transactions, business relations, and the course of dealing between the parties, the circumstances under which their account was received by the defendants, and all of the circumstances connected with and surrounding the whole transaction; and from all these you are to say, gentlemen of the jury, whether any objection was made to the account by Kubli & Bolt within a reasonable time after it had been received by them." "(10) Now, a stated account must be an account that exhibits the items which constitute such an account. For one person to make a stated account against another he must show the items of the account,—items which make up the account. (11) If, however, gentlemen of the jury, you are satisfied from the evidence in this case that the account sent by the plaintiffs in this case to the defendants, and which, it is claimed here, ripened into an account stated by the failure of the defendants to object, if you are satisfied the account did not contain the items of the account,—the items which make up the balance,—still if you are satisfied from the whole evidence in the case that that account made contains the items of account,—the items which made up the balance,—still, if you are satisfied from the whole evidence in the case that that account made such reference either by direct terms or by reason of the course of business between the parties,—made reference to other statements of account then in possession of the defendants,—which statements of account did show all of the items, that will be sufficient, so far as the character of the account is concerned; so far, in other words, as showing the items of the account. An account which simply shows a balance, without setting out the items from which balance arose, is not a statement of account. As I have said to you, that does not constitute a statement of account; but a statement of account must show the items of account." These instructions were severally excepted to by the plaintiffs. The plaintiff asked the court to give the following instructions: "(1) And if the debtor fails for several posts, when the dealings are between parties living in the same state, to object to said statement, he is presumed to have assented thereto. (2) What is a reasonable time in such cases where the facts are clear is always a question exclusively for the court. (3) It is alleged by plaintiffs that on the 10th day of February, 1888, they rendered and presented their account to the defendants, showing the amount due them thereon, which was assented to by defendants as being correct, which allegation is denied by the answer of the defendants; and this is the only issue of fact to be tried and determined by the jury. (4) If you find that plaintiffs rendered and delivered, either in person or by mail, a statement of their account to defendants, on or about the 10th day of February, 1888, and that defendants received the same, and made no objections thereto until August 29, 1888, the account became a stated account, and you will find a verdict for the plaintiffs and against the defendants in the amount asked for in the complaint, less the sum of $58.64, which plaintiffs admit as having received on said account sued on. (5) In this case it is admitted that on February 10, 1888, the plaintiffs sent their statement to defendants, showing the balance claimed by them from defendants; and that the defendants received it in due course of mail, and within a very few days after it was written. That August 29, 1888, was the first time they objected thereto. That there is, and was in the year 1888, daily mail connection between Jacksonville and Portland; and that there was in 1888 mail connection twice a week between Jacksonville and Applegate, distant therefrom about thirteen miles. The court therefore charges you, under the circumstances in this case, that the account rendered became a stated account, and under the pleadings in this case you must find for the plaintiffs and against the defendants in the amount claimed in the complaint, less the sum of $58.64, admitted to have been paid on said account." The court refused to give either of these instructions, to which several rulings of the court the plaintiffs duly excepted.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) 1. We have lately considered what constituted a stated account in two cases, and a reference to them seems to be all that is necessary at this time. In Holmes v. Page, (Or.) 23 Pac. Rep. 961, we held that an account stated is an account which has been rendered by the creditor, and has been assented to by the debtor as correct, either expressly or by implication of law from failure to object; and that the action was not founded upon the items of the account, but on the defendants' consent to the balance stated. And Truman v. Owens, 17 Or. 523, 21 Pac. Rep. 665, is to the same effect. Under the issues in this case the only question to be tried was whether or not the account between the plaintiffs and defendants became a stated account. This question was concisely stated in appellants' fourth and fifth instructions, refused by the court. If the plaintiffs delivered an account to the defendants, either personally or by mail, it would become a stated account if not objected to within a reasonable time; and in an action on such account it cannot be opened only for fraud, error, or mistakes, and the answer in such action must set forth fully the fraud, error, or mistake relied upon. Kronenberger v. Bins, 56 Mo. 121; Terry v. Sickles, 13 Cal. 427; Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162.

2. But it was suggested that an account rendered, which had at the bottom thereof the usual initials, "E. & O. E.," (errors and omissions excepted,) could not become a stated account; that is, it would remain open and unsettled, so that either party would be at liberty to contest any item thereof, though, if these words had been omitted, the account would have become a stated account. But this does not seem to be the effect of those words. An account rendered containing them will become a stated account if not objected to within a reasonable time, with like effect as if they had been omitted. Branger v. Chevalier, 9 Cal. 353; Young v. Hill, supra. By the tenth and eleventh instructions the court charged that an account, before it can become a stated account, must contain the items. If by this was meant each item of merchandise or cash that constituted the debit and credit side of the account, we think the court was in error. The evidence showed that accounts had been rendered from time to time by the plaintiffs. These were in accordance with the course of dealing between the parties; and, though all accounts rendered after the first would begin with the balance claimed to be due on the former accounting, still that fact would not prevent their becoming a stated account. Dows v. Durfee, 10 Barb. 213. Instruction 4, given by the court, and those on the same subject, requested by the plaintiffs and refused, may be considered together. They relate to what is a reasonable time within which a party must object after an account is delivered to him so as to prevent the same becoming a stated account, and whether that was a question of fact for the jury in this particular case, or one of law for the court. Generally, what is a reasonable time when the facts are undisputed is a question of law for the court. Of course, if it were in controversy at what time the account was rendered, or at what time objections were made, these would be questions of fact for a jury; but in every case, as soon as the date is fixed, the question becomes one of law, whether or not such time was reasonable. Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 107 U. S. 325, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 178; Wiggins v. Burkham, 10 Wall. 129; Talcott v. Chew, 27 Fed. Rep. 273; Powell v. Railroad Co., 65 Mo. 658; Lockwood v. Thorne, 11 N. Y. 170. The first instruction asked by the plaintiffs enunciated a correct principle of law, and it is difficult to understand upon what ground the court refused to give it. The earlier rule in the law upon the subject of account stated was that it was applicable to merchants only, (22 Cent. Law J. 76;) but this is not the rule at present. The needs of modern business have so enlarged it that it may be properly applied to all classes of business men. Shepard v. Bank, 15 Mo. 143; White v. Campbell, 25 Mich. 463. But within any rule we are able to find in the books the instruction asked was right, and should have been given. This transaction was between merchants. The account was rendered nearly six months before any objections were heard on the subject. The defendants made a remittance to be applied on account after its rendition, without suggesting any objections to the account. Under these facts the assent of the defendants to the account as rendered must be presumed, and it was the duty of the court to inform the jury that such was the law. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 526; Wiggins v. Burkham, supra; Phillips v. Belden, 2 Edw. Ch. 1; Freas v. Truitt, 2 Colo. 489. Having reached the conclusion that the plaintiffs' theory of this case, as presented by the bill of exceptions, was correct, we are relieved from any further examination of the defendants' views, as they are diametrically opposed to the plaintiffs'. The court erred in giving said instructions 4, 10, and 11, and in failing to give those asked by the plaintiffs. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below for a new trial.

SLATER v. HAAS.

MINING PARTNERSHIP—RETIRING PARTNER.

Where several tenants in common of a mine employ a manager to work and extract the ores therefrom and account to the owners for the proceeds, thus forming a mining copartnership, though not for a fixed or definite period, one of the owners may withdraw from such enterprise without dissolving such copartnership as to the other tenants; and if the others continue thereafter to work the mine the withdrawing party may maintain an action in his own name for his share of the proceeds thus coming into the hands of the manager, without making his co-tenants parties to the action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Lake county court.

justice's court, to recover a small money judgment. On appeal in the county court plaintiff recovered judgment for $112. The defendant, Slater, appeals to this court.

S. J. Hanna, for appellant.

PER CURIAM. The assignments of error are confined to the overruling of defendant's motion for nonsuit and to the rendering of final judgment in favor of plaintiff. The trial in the county court was without a jury, and the only objections or exceptions appearing in the record are as follows: At the close of plaintiff's evidence "the defendant's counsel moved the court for a nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove a good cause of action, which motion the court overruled." The defendant excepted to the ruling, and also excepted to the finding and decision of the court against him at the close of the trial, but did not state the grounds of his objection. There being no written pleadings, (Thorne v. Ornauer, 8 Colo. 353, 8 Pac. Rep. 568,) the questions to be determined on this appeal must be gathered from the evidence. The evidence shows that plaintiff and several other persons, some of them non-residents, were tenants in common of a certain mine in Lake county, plaintiff's interest being one-eighth. These co-tenants employed Slater to work the mine, extract and sell the ores, and account to the owners for the proceeds. By this arrangement it is assumed by counsel for appellant that plaintiff and his co-owners entered into a copartnership, thus constituting a relationship different from that existing between them as tenants in common; and, hence, that plaintiff cannot maintain this action in his own name for his share of the proceeds of the mine in the hands of defendant arising out of such employment. There is no evidence of an express contract of copartnership having been agreed to between the several owners for any fixed or definite period or at all. Nevertheless, the existence of a mining partnership with its peculiar limitations and conditions may perhaps be inferred from the acts of the parties and the circumstances appearing in evidence. Manville v. Parks, 7 Colo. 128, 2 Pac. Rep. 212; Charles v. Eshleman, 5 Colo. 111. During the progress of the work a controversy arose between the plaintiff, Haas, and the defendant, Slater, as to the rate of wages per month the latter was to receive under his contract of hiring; and finally plaintiff undertook by written notice to defendant to terminate defendant's employment so far as plaintiff's interest in the mine was concerned. In such notice plaintiff declared that after a certain date, so far as his (plaintiff's) interest was concerned, he would dispense with defendant's services, and would in no way be responsible for any debts that might be contracted in connection with said mine without his personal consent. This notice was received by defendant, and the substance thereof was promptly communicated by him in writing to the other owners. In such communication defendant, Slater, declared that so long as the other owners chose to retain him in their employ it would not increase their expenses at all, but would only decrease his salary 12½ per cent.,—that is, one-eighth; and that he was ready to relieve plaintiff, Haas, of the burden of his salary. It does not appear that the other owners made any objection to this new arrangement. In addition to giving defendant notice of his withdrawal from the enterprise of working the mine, plaintiff also posted a written notice at the shaft-house, giving similar notice to all persons employed by or dealing with Slater in working the mine. The acceptance of plaintiff's notice by defendant, and his express assent to its terms, the communication thereof to the other owners, and their acquiescence therein, together with his posted notice to all other persons interested, justify the conclusion that there was a withdrawal by plaintiff from any mining copartnership which may have theretofore existed between the several co-tenants. The other owners, as well as plaintiff and defendant, having notice of the new arrangement, the court was warranted in finding that there was a complete termination by mutual consent of plaintiff's liability to defendant under the original contract of employment, and that by this means plaintiff's interest in the proceeds of the mining property was entirely severed from that of his co-tenants. The defendant continued working the mine and extracting ores therefrom for several months after the withdrawal of plaintiff as aforesaid. The evidence was somewhat conflicting as to the rate of monthly wages the defendant was entitled to receive; but it is clear that defendant at the close of his employment reserved out of the proceeds of the mine his monthly wages at the full rate and for the full time as originally claimed by himself, disregarding altogether the abrogation of the original contract resulting from plaintiff's written notice, his own response, and the acquiescence of the other owners. Though not specifically so stated, it is obvious that the finding and judgment of the court were based upon the amount of plaintiff's interest in the surplus proceeds of the mine in the hands of defendant, according to the theory that plaintiff's liability under the original contract had been terminated, and his interest in the proceeds of the mine severed from that of his co-tenants. The findings of fact by the trial court upon the conflicting evidence cannot properly be disturbed. Plaintiff's share in the proceeds of the mine having been entirely severed from that of his co-tenants, there appears to be no legal obstacle to his recovery of the same in this action. The judgment of the county court is accordingly affirmed.

APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—INTERVENTION.

In replevin, where a plea of intervention was filed by a third person, there was a general verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff without any mention of the plea of intervention. Held that, appeals being allowable only when a judgment "shall amount, exclusive of costs, to the sum of $100, or relate to a franchise or freehold,"

(Code Civil Proc. Colo. § 388,) and intervenor's liability for costs being less than that sum even if the judgment be treated as a dismissal of the intervention, an appeal by intervenor would not lie.

HELM, C. J. Appellee White instituted a suit in replevin in the county court against appellee Brophy to recover the possession of certain described animals. Brophy, who is White's nephew, left the country without answering the complaint, and default was entered against him. Appellant filed his plea of intervention under the statute, asserting his right to immediate possession of the property by virtue of a chattel mortgage from Brophy duly executed and recorded. To this plea of intervention an answer was filed by White, and a replication to the answer followed. Under these pleadings, the controversy litigated related to Brophy's ownership of the chattels and right to give the mortgage in question. The cause reached the district court by appeal, and was there tried de novo. A general verdict was reported by the jury in favor of plaintiff for a return of the property, or if such return were not made, then for the value thereof. A general judgment based upon this verdict, and corresponding therewith, was entered by the court. No mention is made of the plea of intervention, nor is there any order or judgment expressly disposing of the issues thus framed. The assumption by intervenor that he is liable under the judgment for a return of the property or the value thereof, is manifestly erroneous. The record shows that upon failure of defendant in the original suit to give a forthcoming bond, the property was by the sheriff delivered to plaintiff in pursuance of law. Intervenor never obtained the possession, and therefore could not have been liable for a return, or for the value in case a return were not made. The judgment simply determines the right of property as between White and Brophy, plaintiff and defendant in the original suit; it imposes no liability upon intervenor.

The court is, in cases like the one at bar, required by statute to "determine upon the intervention." Code Civil Proc. § 24. The trial of the intervention issues may take place in connection with the trial of the principal case, but the court should either in the final replevin judgment, or by order or judgment prior thereto, expressly decide the intervention controversy; and, if the result be adverse to intervenor, the costs of the intervention must be adjudged against him. Id.; Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 430. We need not now consider whether a judgment in the replevin suit finding the right of possession in favor of the original plaintiff or defendant can, under any circumstances, be regarded as equivalent to a dismissal of the plea of intervention. For, in any event, the present appeal must fail. If there is no final order or judgment against intervenor, obviously there is nothing for him to review under the statute, either by appeal or by writ of error. Owen v. Going, 7 Colo. 85, 1 Pac. Rep. 229; Alvord v. McGaughey, 5 Colo. 244. While if the judgment before us be treated as in legal effect a dismissal of the plea of intervention, the liability of intervenor thereunder is less than $100, exclusive of costs, and, no franchise or freehold being involved, an appeal does not lie. Code Civil Proc. § 388. The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

PER CURIAM. By the record in this case it appears that the action was commenced in the district court in October, 1887, by the filing of the complaint and summons. In November and December of the same year the demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and plaintiff electing to abide by its complaint, the action was dismissed. Plaintiff now seeks to review such judgment of dismissal by appeal to this court. By the act of April 23, 1885, appeals might be taken in cases like this. But since August 1, 1887, appeals to this court are allowable only when the judgment "shall amount, exclusive of costs, to the sum of one hundred dollars, or relate to a franchise or freehold." Code, § 388. Hence, this court is without jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. This has been repeatedly decided even in cases where the defendant has joined in error. The infirmity of the present proceeding in this court, being jurisdictional, cannot be waived or cured by consent of parties. The appeal is accordingly dismissed. See Crane v. Farmer, 14 Colo. 294, 23 Pac. Rep. 455, and cases there cited; also, Meyer v. Brophy, ante, 1090, (decided at the present term of this court.) Appeal dismissed.

RECORD ON APPEAL—SERVICE OF NOTICE.

1. The record of a case on appeal must affirmatively show that the notice of appeal was filed with the clerk below, and served upon the adverse party or his attorney, within the time required by the statute.

Bruner & Parsons, for appellants. Tex-us Angel, for respondents.

MORGAN, J. This appeal is taken from the judgment and from the order overruling the motion for a new trial. The respondents ask the court to dismiss the appeal for the reason that the record does not show that there has ever been a notice of appeal filed in this case. The constitution gives this court jurisdiction to review upon appeal any decision of the district court, etc. Section 9, art. 5, Const. The statute points out the method by which an appeal to the supreme court is taken, as follows: "An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party, or his attorney." Section 4808, Rev. St. Idaho. The record must affirmatively show that the notice of appeal was filed with the clerk below, and served upon the adverse party, or his attorney, within the time required by statute. Franklin v. Reiner, 8 Cal. 340; Whipple v. Mills, 9 Cal. 641; Hayne, New Trials & App. § 210, and other authorities there cited; Brewing Co. v. Gillman, (Idaho,) 10 Pac. Rep. 32. Judgment in this cause was rendered in the district court on May 31, 1889, and placed on file June 1, 1889. Order overruling motion for new trial was filed January 8, 1890. Notice of appeal from said order and from the judgment was served on counsel for respondents March 10, 1890. This service was not within the 60 days given by the statute within which an appeal may be taken from an order overruling a motion for a new trial. The record does not show that the notice of appeal was ever filed with the clerk. That which is required by the statute cannot be dispensed with by the court. Failure of service of notice of appeal within the 60 days is fatal to the appeal from the order overruling the motion for a new trial. Failure to file the notice with the clerk of the court below is fatal to both appeals. Without these requirements of the statute are complied with, this court has no jurisdiction. Objection for want of jurisdiction may be made at any time. Both appeals are dismissed.

COURT REPORTERS—COMPENSATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—MANDAMUS.

1. Stenographic reporters, appointed by district judges under an act of the fifteenth legislative assembly, are entitled to the compensation fixed by said act.

2. Said act is not repugnant to the constitution.

3. Said act creates the office of court reporter and makes the appropriation for the payment of his salary.

4. Mandamus will issue to compel the state auditor to issue a warrant for the payment of the court reporter's salary as required by said act.

5. The act of the first legislative assembly of the state of Idaho, amending the Revised Statutes of Idaho territory, and the Fifteenth Session Laws, changing the word "territory" to "state," and "comptroller" to "auditor," is not in conflict with the constitution.

(Syllabus by Sullivan, C. J.)

Cahalan & Budyer, for plaintiff. George H. Roberts, Atty. Gen., for defendant.

SULLIVAN, C. J. The plaintiff, Justin Gilbert, applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, Hon. Silas W. Moody, auditor of the state of Idaho, to issue his warrant in favor of the plaintiff, in payment for certain services claimed to have been performed by said plaintiff as stenographic court reporter. The material facts set forth in said application are substantially as follows: On the 3d day of April, 1889, the plaintiff was duly appointed stenographic court reporter of the second judicial district of Idaho territory, by Chief Justice WIER, sitting as a district judge of said judicial district. That said plaintiff entered upon and performed the duties of said office, and performed the same under said appointment, to and including the 2d day of November, 1890, for which services he received the compensation provided by law. That from and after said 2d day of November, 1890, to the 18th day of November, 1890, he continued to perform the duties of said office under and by virtue of said appointment made as aforesaid. That on the 18th day of November, 1890, the plaintiff was duly appointed stenographic reporter of the third judicial district of the state of Idaho by the Hon. E. NUGENT, judge of said third district. That on said 18th day of November he entered upon his duties as such stenographic reporter under said appointment, and continued to perform the duties of such position up to the close of the 11th day of January, 1891, and still continues to perform said duties under said last appointment. That on the 9th day of January, 1891, the plaintiff presented his claim against the state of Idaho, for his services as official reporter, from the 3d day of November, 1890, to the 11th day of January, 1891; both mentioned days included, amounting in all to the sum of $374.98. That on the 9th day of January, 1891, the defendant was, ever since has been, and now is, the duly-qualified and acting auditor of the state of Idaho. That the defendant, as such auditor, refused to allow plaintiff's said claim, and refused to issue to the plaintiff his warrant in payment of said claim, and asks that a writ of mandate be issued out of this court commanding the said auditor to draw his warrant on the state treasurer of Idaho, in favor of the plaintiff, for the amount of said claim. The defendant admits all of the material facts set forth in plaintiff's application, but denies that the Hon. E. NUGENT, as judge of the third judicial district of the state of Idaho, had any authority to appoint the plaintiff stenographic reporter of said third district court. And further alleges that no appropriation has been made by law for the payment of compensation to the stenographic court reporter of said district court; and, further, that there is no money or funds in the hands of the treasurer of the state of Idaho applicable to the payment of plaintiff's said claim.

This case involves the validity of an act passed by the fifteenth legislative assembly of Idaho, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a court stenographic reporter in each judicial district of Idaho territory," which act was approved February 4, 1889, (15th Sess. Laws, p. 25.) The plaintiff, in said application for a writ of mandate, alleges that he was appointed official reporter of the second judicial district of the territory of Idaho, and performed the duties of that position until the 18th day of November, 1890, on which date he was appointed official reporter of the district court of the third judicial district of the state of Idaho, and performed the duties of such position to and including the 11th day of January, 1891. The defendant contends that the appointment of the plaintiff, made by the Hon. E. NUGENT, judge of the third judicial district of the state of Idaho, on the 18th day of November, 1890, was made without authority of law. The first point to be determined, then, is whether the Hon. E. NUGENT, judge of the district court of the third judicial district of the state of Idaho, had the authority to appoint the plaintiff official reporter of said court on the 18th day of November, 1890. In other words, was the act above referred to in force on the 18th day of November, 1890, and continued in force to and including the 11th day of January, 1891? Idaho was admitted as a state on the 3d day of July, A. D. 1890, under a constitution theretofore adopted by the people of the state. Section 2 of article 21 of said constitution is as follows: "All laws now in force in the territory of Idaho, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or be altered or repealed by the legislature." It is not claimed that said act has expired by its own limitation, or has been repealed or altered by the legislature. Said act in no manner conflicts with the provisions of the constitution, and is not repugnant thereto; hence said act was in force at the date of said appointment, and has been in force since its approval, February 4, 1889. Said act authorized the judges of each district court, in the then territory of Idaho, to appoint a competent official reporter; defines his duties; fixes the tenure of his office, and his yearly compensation; directs that it be paid quarterly out of the general fund of the territorial treasury; and authorizes the comptroller to draw his warrants, to make such payments, when they shall become due. Gen. Laws Idaho, 15th Sess., 1888-89, p. 25. The defendant also contends that no appropriation has been made for the payment of this claim, as required by section 13 of article 7 of the constitution. The act in question makes the appropriation. It fixes the compensation, the time of payment, and authorizes the comptroller to draw his warrant to pay the same when due. No further appropriation is required. The defendant further contends that the act of the present session of the legislature, amending the Revised Statutes of Idaho, and the General Laws of Idaho of the Fifteenth Session, by changing the word "territory" to "state," and "comptroller" to "auditor," is in conflict with section 18, art. 3, of the constitution, which section is as follows: "No act shall be revised or amended by mere reference to its title; but the section as amended shall be set forth and published at length." The object of this provision is to prevent obscurity, confusion, and uncertainty in the laws. This section deals with such amendments of existing legislation as change the application, force, or effect of an act, or a portion thereof. The amendments referred to do not change the application, force, or effect of the sections amended, but merely change the words "territory" to "state," and "comptroller" to "auditor." These amendments cannot result in any ambiguity or uncertainty, nor can any one be misled as to the purpose of these amendments. To hold that each section, so amended, should be published at length would be an unreasonable construction of said provision, and entail needless expense upon the people. The office of comptroller has not been abolished by the constitution,—the name only as been changed to "auditor." The fact that there are no funds in the hands of the treasurer of the state with which to pay said claim will not excuse the auditor from issuing his warrant. We are of the opinion that a peremptory writ should issue, and it is so ordered.

HOMICIDE — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — GOOD CHARACTER.

1. On indictment for murder, evidence that deceased had at one time been castrated is inadmissible to show malice, where there is no evidence connecting defendant with his castration.

2. On trial for murder, an instruction that "where the evidence, outside of the presumption of good character, is clear and explicit, on which no doubt can be cast, good character will only cause the jury to hesitate and think about the matter," is erroneous, in that it limits the effect of good character to doubtful cases.

3. An instruction that "a man has to commit his first crime. He cannot commit all the crimes, if he does commit many, at once. He has to break over the rules of good conduct and good life for the first time some time in his life" is erroneous, and, if not withdrawn from the jury, is not cured by a subsequent correct instruction as to the effect of good character.

4. On trial for a murder committed 32 years before, when the principal witness for the prosecution was only 5 years old, where the other witnesses have grown old, the lapse of time since the commission of the crime is a strong circumstance to be considered by the jury.

Appeal from district court, first district; BLACKBURN, Justice.

Arthur Brown and Wm. H. King, for appellant. C. S. Varian, U. S. Atty., for the People.

MINER, J. The indictment in this case charges this defendant and two others with the murder of Henry Jones on the 24th of April, 1858. It was found by the grand jury on the 8th day of March, 1890, or 32 years after the alleged crime was committed. Defendant Hancock was tried separately. The record shows that on April 24, 1858, the deceased, Henry Jones, was living with his mother, Hannah Jones, his brother, John Jones, and little sister, Ellen H. Brown, in a small dug-out at Payson, Utah. At this time Ellen was a child of about five years of age. At the time of the trial it appeared from Ellen's testimony that at about 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening of April 24, 1858, she was awakened by a disturbance outside the dug-out, caused by the firing of guns. She remembers seeing her two brothers, Henry, the deceased, and John, get up, hurriedly dress themselves, take their guns, and go out on the roof through a chimney hole. That soon after this five or six men came into the cabin, and wanted her mother to tell them something; but what they wanted her to tell, she could not remember; it was so long ago. She does remember, however, that her mother was begging and pleading for the lives of her boys, and that one of the men shot and killed her mother. There being no light in the room, she was unable to distinguish who was present. She was a stranger there at this time, and did not know the defendant Hancock. That several weeks after she saw Charles Hancock, the defendant's brother, on the street, and recognized him as the man that killed her mother; and that on July 4, 1858, she saw the defendant, and recognized him as one of the men who were present when her mother was killed, and that she was frightened at seeing him, and went and told her father. It also appears that on this occasion defendant Hancock was a constable. That this was a time of Indian wars, and guards were constantly kept out to guard against surprises from the Indians; and that Hancock and others of these guards had discovered a scheme on the part of Jones and his brother to steal horses that night, and escape from the settlement to meet the United States army, then not far distant; and that Jones was in fear of injury from the hands of the people at this time, which fear induced him to attempt to leave the country with stolen horses. That, in order to frustrate this scheme which had been discovered, watchmen had been placed at the corra' where the horses were kept and at Jones' house, to prevent his escape, as well as to guard against surprises from the Indians. That, after Jones had escaped from the dug-out, he went from place to place in that vicinity to escape pursuit, and was much frightened, and that he was shot in the arm while eluding pursuit, or in attacking an antagonist, which was alleged to be the defendant. Jones continued his efforts to escape, and early in the morning arrived at a town called Salem, or Pond Town, some three or four miles from his mother's house. That the posse, including the defendant, Hancock and many others, were in hot pursuit, and caught the deceased at this latter place, disarmed him, and took him prisoner. Hancock seemed to be in command. A guard was placed on each side of the deceased. Hancock was a little to the rear, and others about and around them. In this position they started with the deceased to return to Payson with him. This was supposed to be three or four hours after the killing of Mrs. Jones. Thus guarded, the party started for Payson. What followed is a matter of speculation, as the witnesses all disagree. It appears, however, from the testimony of one Wilson, (a witness for the prosecution, whose testimony was discredited and impeached in many ways,) that Hancock directed the posse in charge of Jones to take him to Payson. All were armed, except the deceased. While walking along in the direction of Payson, and talking about stealing horses, etc., Jones remarked that he didn't want to go with them; that they had killed his brother; and he was not going with them, etc. About this time Jones looked up, and saw some other parties coming towards them, and remarked: "There comes some more of the d—d cusses after me." He then stopped, and threw up his hands, at which time the prosecution claims that Hancock remarked to his companions: "Now slap it to him, boys." A gun cracked, and then another, and Jones fell mortally wounded, and soon afterwards died where he was shot. There was a large party present at this killing, most of whom have since died. The next day Jones' body was taken by some one other than the defendant, and placed with that of his mother, without washing or changing the clothes. The supports to the roof of the dug-out were taken down, and the roof lowered to cover the remains, and they were both left thus entombed. It also appears, under objection from defendant's counsel, that a long time prior to this killing Jones had been castrated by parties then unknown. The defendant is not proved as having any complicity in that act. That prior to, and after the killing, Hancock had been a person of good moral character. Different and contradictory accounts of the killing of Mrs. Jones and her son, and of the time when the killing took place, appear from the testimony; but enough does appear to show that the killing of Mrs. Jones was a different transaction from that of the killing of Henry Jones; and whether Hancock was present at her death or not is left in dispute and uncertain. On the trial the defendant was convicted. Defendant's counsel assign 12 errors as grounds for a reversal of the verdict and judgment of conviction. Among them are the following: "(3) The court erred in allowing Henry Gardner, against the objection of counsel for defendant, to testify that Henry Jones had been castrated, and had no testicles." "(7) The court erred in refusing each one of the several requests asked for the defendant, to-wit, severally, each one of the twenty-one requests appearing in the record. (8) The court erred in charging the jury as to the effect of good character. (9) The court erred in charging the jury upon the facts as to the belief to be attached to witnesses who testified to the exact language thirty-two years after the transaction. (10) The court erred in charging the jury that time does not run in favor of murder, and in charging that no lapse of time washes out the stains that the blood shed by the murderer makes, and in charging generally upon the facts of the case." (12) The court erred in charging the jury as to the subject of justification, the defendant not having made or asked for justification, but denying the killing; and the charge on the subject of killing was an argument that the defendant was guilty."

We do not consider it necessary to review each assignment separately. In the course of the trial it appeared by the testimony of Henry Gardner, under objection from the defendant's counsel, that Henry Jones had been castrated some considerable time before the alleged homicide. It nowhere appears that the defendant had any hand or complicity in this transaction, or was in any manner chargeable therewith, or that that fact in any way tends to elucidate the question involved, or throws any light upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The presumption is that this testimony was admitted for the purpose of showing malice on the part of the defendant, and that was probably the ground upon which the learned judge admitted the testimony. If this be so, the prosecution failed in any way to connect the defendant with the act of castration. This, we think, was error. The only object for its admission, if it was admissible at all, would be to show that the defendant committed the act, or assisted in its commission, and that he must have had malice against the deceased at that time; and, when the prosecution failed to connect the defendant with the act, the testimony becomes wholly incompetent. Its admission, under the circumstances, would naturally tend to awaken a prejudice in the minds of the jury against the defendant. Testimony of this transaction was foreign to the issue and should not have been allowed.

Error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as follows: "(16) In a criminal trial, evidence of the good character of a person is of value not only in doubtful cases, but also when the testimony tends very strongly to establish the guilt of the accused. It will of itself sometimes create a doubt when without it none would exist. (17) There is no case in which the jury may not, in the exercise of a sound judgment, give a person the benefit of a previous good character. No matter how conclusive the other testimony may appear to be, the character of the accused may be such as to create a doubt in the minds of the jury, and lead them to believe, in view of the probabilities, that a person of high character would not be guilty of the offense charged, that the other evidence in the case is false, or the witnesses mistaken." The court refused these requests, but instructed the jury as follows: "Proof of the good character of the person charged with the offense is always allowed in this class of cases, and the weight to be given to it is to be determined by the jury. It is all-important in doubtful cases. Where the evidence, outside of the presumption of good character, is clear and explicit, on which no doubt can be cast, good character will only cause the jury to hesitate and think about the matter. The jury will always remember that a man has to commit his first crime. He cannot commit all the crimes, if he does commit many, at once. He has to break over the rules of good conduct and good life for the first time some time in his life." We think the requests numbered 16 and 17 should have been either given to the jury or embraced in the charge of the court, and that the instruction given to the jury on the court's own motion was erroneous. This charge, as given, limited the effect of good character to doubtful cases; and that, in cases where the evidence was clear, such evidence would only have the effect to cause the jury to hesitate and think about the matter. In other words, that in clear cases of guilt good character should have no weight, except for the jury to stop and think, but in doubtful cases it was all-important. We think the charge was misleading. In doubtful cases the jury should give the defendant the benefit of the doubt, and acquit; and to do so it would not be necessary for the defendant to add proof of good character to the doubt already existing in order to be entitled to an acquittal. It is in clear cases, therefore, where evidence of good character is of the most avail. There may be cases made out so clear that no good character can make them doubtful; but there may be others in which evidence given against a person without character would amount to a conviction, in which a high character would produce a reasonable doubt, or in which high character will actually outweigh evidence which might otherwise appear conclusive. "Good character is an important fact with every man; and never more so than when he is put on trial charged with an offense which is rendered improbable in the last degree by a uniform course of life wholly inconsistent with any such crime. There are cases where it becomes a man's sole dependence, and yet may prove sufficient to outweigh evidence of the most positive character. The most clear and convincing cases are sometimes satisfactorily rebutted by it, and a life of unblemished integrity becomes a complete shield of protection against the most skillful web of suspicion and falsehood which conspirators have been able to weave. Good character may not only raise a doubt of guilt which would not otherwise exist, but it may bring conviction of innocence. In every criminal trial it is a fact which the defendant is at liberty to put in evidence; and, being in, the jury have a right to give it such weight as they think it entitled to." People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9; People v. Mead, 50 Mich. 233, 15 N. W. Rep. 95; Com. v. Leonard, 140 Mass. 479, 4 N. E. Rep. 96; Cancemi v. People, 16 N. Y. 501; *Harrington v. sen v. People, 43 N. Y. 6; Heine v. Com., 91 Pa. St. 145; State v. Daley, 53 Vt. 442; Coleman v. State, 59 Miss. 484; Whart. Crim. Ev. § 66.

This charge also gave the jury to understand that a man was expected to commit his first offense; and the jury may have been led to believe from it that the offense charged might be one of those crimes that the defendant might be expected to commit for the first time, and that, as a matter of course, if the defendant had a good character, and had never been connected with any crime before, he might now be expected to be guilty of this one; that the time had come at last for the defendant to break over the rule of good conduct, and commit his first offense; and that this might properly be expected from all men. We think this was error, and that it was not cured by a subsequent instruction to the jury at the close of the case, wherein the court said: "Gentlemen of the jury, I may have overlooked one important matter. I don't remember now what I said to you in reference to the character of the defendant. The character of the defendant is to be considered by you in weighing all the testimony in the case. If his character, notwithstanding all the evidence in the case, raises a doubt in your mind as to his guilt or innocence,—a reasonable doubt,—he is to have the benefit of it." This instruction in no way modifies the erroneous instruction first given: nor does the court withdraw his first instruction from the consideration of the jury, but leaves it to stand as the law in the case, which it is presumed the court did not intend to do. When conflicting charges are given, one of which is erroneous, it is to be presumed that the jury may have followed that which was erroneous. Railway Co. v. Monroe, 47 Mich. 152, 10 N. W. Rep. 179; Jones v. Talbot, 4 Mo. 285; Brown v. McAllister, 39 Cal. 577; Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 21; Phillips v. Jamieson, 51 Mich. 153, 16 N. W. Rep. 318; Murray v. Com., 79 Pa. The court also instructed the jury as follows: "The length of time that has elapsed since the murder that is charged was committed and the commencement of this prosecution is not to be considered at all. It is not an element to determine the guilt or innocence of this party. It is a matter not affecting his guilt or innocence, one way or the other. Time does not run against the murderer or in his favor. No lapse of time washes out the stains that blood shed by the murderer makes." This charge was possibly given under a mistake of fact. We think it had a tendency to mislead the jury, and that from it they might infer what the opinion of the court was as to the identity of the murderer, the degree of the offense, and the guilt of the defendant. This homicide was committed 32 years ago, and when we consider that the witness, Ellen Brown, was only 5 years of age at that time, and that other witnesses had grown old, and possibly forgetful with increasing age, we cannot conclude that the length of time that has elapsed since the homicide should not be a strong circumstance to enter into the consideration of the jury in testing the truthfulness, forgetfulness, candor, or bias of those left to relate the circumstance of this alleged murder, and as bearing upon the probabilities of the guilt or innocence of the accused. Hopt v. People, 110 U. S. 574, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202. For the reason stated the verdict and judgment of the court below should be set aside, and a new trial granted.

DONAHUE v. MEISTER. (No. 14,074.)

QUIETING TITLE—JURY TRIAL—MINING CLAIMS—NOTICE OF LOCATION.

1. Under Const. Cal. art. 1, § 7, providing that the right to trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate, defendant, in an action to quiet title under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, is entitled to jury trial on the issues of prior possession and ouster when his verified answer shows that shortly before the commencement of the action he was rightfully in possession, and was ousted by plaintiff and wrongfully kept out of possession by him.

2. Where, by a local mining custom, notices of location of quartz claims must be in writing, and "posted conspicuously in a conspicuous place upon the claim located at or near the lode line," a notice of location written on paper, folded with the writing inside, and placed on a mound of rocks about three feet high, under two flat rocks, to protect it from the weather, but with a part of the margin exposed to view, is properly posted, especially where it appears that the claimant properly marked the boundaries, and for three years, until ousted, performed annually the amount of labor required by law.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; WALLING, Judge.

McFARLAND, J. This is, in form, an action, under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to quiet title to a certain quartz mining claim and land called by plaintiff the "Uncle Sam" claim. The complaint is in the usual form, and contains an averment that plaintiff is in possession of the premises in contest. In the answer all the averments of the complaint are denied except that of possession. It is further averred in the answer that the south half of said Uncle Sam claimed by plaintiff is identical with the north half of a quartz mining claim, called the "Waldeck," belonging to defendant; that defendant is entitled to the possession of said south half of said Uncle Sam, and "was lawfully possessed thereof" for several years next preceding April 6, 1889; that on said April 6th "the plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully entered thereon" and ousted defendant therefrom; and that plaintiff wrongfully withholds the same from defendant. In the prayer of the answer the defendant asked, in addition to general relief, that he "be restored to the possession of that part of the Waldeck ledge described as being in controversy." At the proper time defendant demanded a jury "on the issue raised by his said averments of prior possession and ouster." The plaintiff opposed the demand because the case was a proceeding in equity; and on that ground the court refused a jury. The court then proceeded to try the case, and, after making certain findings, rendered judgment against defendant, from which he appeals. And the first point made by appellant is that the court erred in denying his demand for a jury. We think that in this contention appellant is right.

It is quite clear that the legislature, by the mere device of adding new cases to those of a class to which former equitable remedies were applicable, cannot encroach upon that provision of the state constitution which says that "the right to trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate." Article I, § 7. And section 738 of the Code must not be construed as intending to violate that provision of the constitution unless that construction be unavoidable. Issues about titles to land, such as those presented by the answer in the case at bar, were triable at law at the time the constitution was adopted, and therefore either party has the right to have such issues tried by a jury. (Taber v. Cook, 15 Mich. 322,) and section 738 need not be construed as attempting to take away that right. The main effect of said section is to give parties the right to compel others, by suit, to litigate and determine controversies in cases where such right did not before exist; but if, in such a suit, issues arise which are clearly legal and cognizable in a court of law, the Code does not take away the right to have such issues tried by a jury. Formerly an action like the one at bar could not have been maintained at all. Plaintiff would have been compelled to wait until the defendant chose to disturb his possession by an action. The Code enabled one in his position to commence the legal contest; but when he thus brings a defendant into court he must be prepared to meet any pertinent issues which the latter may tender, and to try them in the way in which the defendant has the right, under the constitution, to have them tried. The nature of the action to quiet title before and after the Code provision is clearly stated by FIELD, C. J., in Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 262. At that time the provision of the statute was substantially as it is now, except that the plaintiff was required to be in possession. The learned judge says: "This statute enlarges the class of cases in which equitable relief could formerly be sought in the quieting of title. It authorizes the interposition of equity in cases where previously bills of peace would not lie. Such bills were of two classes. Those of one class lay where the right which the plaintiff asserted was controverted by numerous persons, holding distinct and separate interests upon a common source. A right of fishery asserted by one party, and controverted by numerous riparian proprietors on the river, and the right to tithes claimed by a parson and controverted by his parishioners, are instances cited by Story where a bill of this nature would lie. Bills of the other class lay where the plaintiff was in possession of real property, and his possession had been disturbed by legal proceedings, in which his title had been successfully maintained. To the prosecution of bills of this latter class the concurrence of three particulars was essential,—the possession in the plaintiff, the disturbance of that possession by legal proceedings on the part of the defendant, and the establishment of the right of the plaintiff by judgment in his favor in such proceedings. Shepley v. Rangely, 2 Ware, 249. The necessity of bills of this class naturally arose from the nature of the action of ejectment, which being founded on a fictitious demise between fictitious parties, a recovery therein constituted no bar to another action. Thus the successful party might, by repeated actions, be subjected to vexatious and harassing litigation, and to procure repose courts of equity interpose and finally determine the controversy. It was in this way only that adequate relief could be administered. Devonsher v. Newenham, 2 Schoales & L. 208; Welby v. Duke of Rutland, 2 Brown, Parl. Cas. 39. Under the statute of this state it is unnecessary for the plaintiff to delay seeking the equitable interposition of the court until he has been disturbed in his possession by the institution of a suit against him, and until judgment in such suit has been passed in his favor. It is sufficient if, while in the possession of the property, a party out of possession claim an estate or interest adverse to him. He can immediately, upon knowledge of the assertion of such claim, require the nature and character of the adverse estate or interest to be produced, exposed, and judicially determined, and the question of title be thus forever quieted. It does not follow from the fact that the suit is brought in equity that the determination of questions purely of a legal character in relation to the title will necessarily be withdrawn from the ordinary cognizance of a court of law. The court, sitting in equity, may direct, whenever in its judgment it may become proper, an issue to be framed upon the pleadings and submitted to the jury. Upon the verdict of the jury, if a new trial be not granted, the court will then act, by either dismissing the bill, or by adjudging the adverse estate or interest claimed to be invalid, and of no effect, and awarding a perpetual injunction against its assertion to the property in question. There is no difficulty in so conducting a suit, under the statute, as to fully protect the legal rights of the parties, and at the same time to secure the beneficial results afforded by a court of equity in bills of peace, which is repose from further litigation." In People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. Rep. 263, 6 Pac. Rep. 481, which was an action like the one at the bar, the court refers to Curtis v. Sutter, and says: "It may be the original defendants herein would have been entitled to demand a jury to try the legal issue as to the right of possession, but a jury was expressly waived." And there is the same intimation in Hyde v. Redding, 74 Cal. 497, 16 Pac. Rep. 380. Counsel have not called our attention to any cases in this state where the point now under discussion has been clearly decided adversely to appellant's contention, although cases can no doubt be found where the court, not having its attention closely called to the subject, has assumed that the proceeding under the Code is an equitable action, and referred to the general rule that courts of chancery need not call upon juries for assistance. But it is clear that the right to a jury trial cannot be avoided by merely calling an action equitable. If that were so, the legislature, by providing new remedies and new kinds of judgments and decrees in form equitable, could in all cases dispense with juries, and thus entirely defeat the constitutional provision on the subject. In Hyde v. Redding, supra, the court intimates that the proceeding under section 738 of the Code may be either a suit in equity or an action at law. It is really a statutory action. The Code confers equitable rights so far as it grants the power to maintain the action at all, and the decree is in form equitable; but if it has to deal with ordinary common-law rights clearly cognizable in courts of law it is to that extent an action at law. And the proper course to be pursued in such a case is clearly pointed out by Judge FIELD in Curtis v. Sutter, supra.

The point here involved has been more thoroughly considered by the supreme court of Pennsylvania than in any other tribunal to which our attention has been called. In that state the legislature attempted in several different acts to avoid the right of trial by jury by providing new proceedings in equity for the determination of issues which parties clearly had the right to have determined by courts of law and juries; and in every instance the court held, either that the act was unconstitutional, or that it should be so construed as not to cut off the right of trial by jury. In one of those cases the court, in commenting on the attempt above stated, say: "If this could be done, there is not an ejectionment in the common-law courts which, by the inversion of parties, could not be brought into a court of equity." Haines' Appeal, 73 Pa. St. 172. In another case the court, speaking of the provisions of the constitution, say: "It cannot mean that the legislature may confer upon the supreme court and the courts of common pleas the power of trying according to the course of chancery any question which has always been triable according to the course of law by a jury." Norris' Appeal, 64 Pa. St. 281. In another case the court say: "An act of the assembly transferring any part of the jurisdiction of the common-law courts to a court of chancery, would be unconstitutional." Tillmes v. Marsh, 67 Pa. St. 508. The limits of this opinion will not allow more extended quotations from other cases, but the point will be found to be fully discussed and pointedly decided in Coal Co. v. Snowden, 42 Pa. St. 488; Norris' Appeal, 64 Pa. St. 275; Haines' Appeal, 73 Pa. St. 169; and Tillmes v. Marsh, 67 Pa. St. 507.

In the case at bar, according to the verified answer, defendant was entitled to possession, and was in the possession, of the disputed premises a short time before the commencement of the action, and was ousted by the plaintiff. If, under these circumstances, defendant had commenced an action against plaintiff to recover possession, it would have been conceded by all that either party would have been entitled to a jury trial. But it is equally clear that plaintiff, by first bringing suit and thus inverting the parties, could not deprive defendant of his right to a jury. If it were not for the provision of the Code, plaintiff would have been compelled to wait until defendant commenced his action, and then there would have been no question about the right to a jury; but, while the legislature had the power to grant the plaintiff the privilege of himself commencing the suit, it had not the power to give him, and we think did not intend to give him, the privilege of thus depriving defendant of his constitutional right. We have discussed this point somewhat at length because there is a growing tendency to resort to the statutory action to quiet title when other actions would be more appropriate; and it is well to consider the general nature of the proceeding. But, as other difficult questions may hereafter arise where this form of action is used, it is proper to say that the decision in the case at bar rests upon the facts of the case. It is decided here only that where the answer shows that the defendant was rightfully in possession, and was ousted by plaintiff, and wrongfully kept out of possession, upon the trial of those issues the defendant is entitled to a jury trial. For the reason above given the judgment must be reversed; but as there may be another trial of the case it is necessary to notice another point made by appellant.

As we understand from the findings, the court rendered judgment against defendant solely upon the ground that the original notice of location which defendant put on the Waldeck claim on October 7, 1886,—nearly three years before plaintiff's location,—was entirely invalid, and all acts done afterward worthless, because it was not posted in a proper manner. The court found that there was a local mining custom in the district that all notices of location of quartz claims should be in writing, and "posted conspicuously in a conspicuous place upon the claim located, at or near the lode line of said claim, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of said Nevada county." We gather from the findings that defendant's notice was in due form, and was put upon the lode line, and was duly recorded; that he properly marked his boundaries; that he performed annually upon the claim the amount of labor required by law and on that part of the claim which is in dispute; that his location was made in good faith; and that from October 7, 1886, to April, 1889,—the time when plaintiff's location was made,—he "in all other respects complied with law and custom except as to the manner of posting the notice." The notice was placed on the claim in this way: It was written on one side of a sheet of paper which was folded, with the writing inside, and placed upon a mound of rocks three feet high, and upon the notice were placed two flat rocks, so that about three-fourths of an inch of the margin of the paper was exposed to view, the rest of the paper being obscured by the two stones which covered it. For this reason the court held that the notice was not conspicuously posted, and that therefore the entire location was void. In so holding the court, we think, erred. It was not found that the notice was so placed for the purpose of concealing it; but it was found that the location was made in good faith, and that "in posting said notice defendant, Meister, (who posted the same,) intended protecting it from the weather, and had made prior locations in the same way." It is further found that "other devices were resorted to by miners to protect the notices from the weather, such as covering the notice with glass, or folding it in a box and placing the box in a conspicuous place." If the plaintiff had attempted to relocate the claim immediately after defendant's notice had been placed there, and before defendant had done further acts of possession, and before there had been any legislation by congress upon the subject, and the only question had been as to the sufficiency of the posting, still we think that the posting, as shown by the findings, would have been sufficient. A substantial compliance with mining customs, where good faith is shown, is certainly sufficient. It appears that various devices were resorted to by miners in the district to protect their notices from the weather. The method which defendant adopted is certainly not more objectionable than "folding it in a box." An artificial mound of rocks on the line of a lode is a conspicuous object, which would naturally attract the attention of one seeking information as to a former location of the lode; and the slightest examination of the mound would result in the discovery of the written notice. Plaintiff should have seen it, and if he did see it, and had the actual knowledge which it gave, but concluded to take advantage of what he deemed a defect in the manner of posting, the technical point which he thus made is entitled to but little consideration. It does not appear how much labor and money defendant expended on his claim during the several years preceding plaintiff's entry, except that he expended more than was necessary to comply with the law; but if he had expended large sums of money in developing the mine, and had sold interests to others at high prices, the proposition to forfeit it all because he partly covered his original notice with two stones to protect it from the weather would, we think, have appalled either judge or jury. But the above view is greatly strengthened when we reflect that under the laws of congress the original notice cuts but little figure after the other acts necessary to the valid location of the mining claim have been done. The notice is valuable chiefly as a temporary protection to the locator while the other acts are being performed. Under the law of congress, "distinctly marking the location upon the ground, so that the boundaries may be readily traced," is necessary, and is the main act of original location. Holland v. Mining

Co., 53 Cal. 149. In Gleeson v. Mining Co., 13 Nev. 464. BEATTY, J., delivering the opinion of the court, speaks of congressional legislation on the subject as introducing "a system in which the preliminary posting and recording of notices is entirely out of place, except as a means of protecting a claim during the time necessary for tracing the ledge and marking the boundaries of the location. When the location is thus marked, all that the notice and record were ever intended or expected to accomplish is effected in a manner far more satisfactory and complete." We quote the above remarks, not to the point that a mining custom requiring the posting of a notice in a particular way can be wholly disregarded, (which is not necessary here to be decided,) but as showing additional reasons why such a custom, when invoked years after all other acts of location have been done, should receive a liberal and not a strict construction. Our conclusion is that (whatever evidence may be presented on another trial) under the facts as shown in the findings before us the the posting of defendant's original notice should be held to have been a substantial and sufficient compliance with the said custom. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. CHEW SING WING. (No. 20,661.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1891.)

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—FUNCTIONS OF THE JURY.

1. Where, on indictment for murder, the evidence does not show circumstances which are made by statute conclusive of murder in the first degree, an instruction that, if the testimony is believed, the prosecution has made out a case of murder in the first degree, by showing premeditation, deliberation, and malice, is erroneous, being in contravention of Const. Cal. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting a charge to the jury with respect to matters of fact.

2. The supreme court, on appeal, cannot weigh the evidence to find that the judgment was warranted notwithstanding an erroneous charge.

3. The error in such instruction is not cured by a subsequent statement by the court not particularly withdrawing his remarks, but merely charging the jury that they must disregard any opinions he may have expressed on the evidence, of which they are the sole judges.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. Mc-M. SHAFTER, Judge.

J. N. E. Wilson and T. D. Riordan, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was by information charged with the murder of one Leuy Jing. He was tried, and convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be imprisoned for life. He appeals from the judgment and order refusing him a new trial. Upon the trial one Chang Fook, a witness for the people, testified: "I was going up Baker's alley on the night of the 13th of July, 1889, in San Francisco. * * * I saw Leuy Jing coming down the alley and the defendant coming seven or eight steps behind him. I saw the defendant fire a pistol at Leuy Jing. After the defendant fired the shot he ran back up the alley, while Leuy Jing kind of hurried off down towards Dupont street. * * * When I saw Leuy Jing shot he ran down the alley. * * * He said, 'Save life,' and he said, 'Sun Wing has shot me.' There were also introduced the dying declarations of the deceased, which were, in substance, that defendant shot him; that he turned, and saw him; that defendant followed him out of his room. He further said: "He accused me of asking Cum Moon for money. I did not attempt to hurt him or any one." This was all of the evidence in the case tending to show the circumstances of the shooting, and the court gave the following instruction to the jury: "If the testimony bearing upon the question of the killing, so far simply as the deceased is concerned, and the means by which he came to his end, are believed by you, it would undoubtedly make out a case by the prosecution of murder in the first degree, under the statutes. The testimony tends to show, under the circumstances, that the killing—whoever committed it—must have been deliberate, must have been premeditated, must have been unlawful, and must have been malicious. All the elements of murder in the first degree occur upon the testimony, if believed, as given in the case, and by the conversation of certain persons. The only question would be as to who committed the murder. The testimony is, I believe, contradicted, that this man, the deceased, was shot in that alley, in what is called 'Chinatown' in this city, in the night, in the back; that he ran a short distance, fell, and was picked up, and died of that wound; and that the murderer—so far as the immediate evidence is concerned, as to the act of killing—escaped from the spot without any further detection than this given by the testimony of one witness, who professes to have seen the transaction."

1. This instruction contravenes section 19 of article 6 of the constitution of this state, which declares: "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony, and declare the law." People v. Ybarra, 17 Cal. 171; People v. Ah Lee, 60 Cal. 85. In People v. Ybarra, supra, the court, speaking through COPE, J., say: "This provision is violated whenever a judge so instructs as to force the jury to a particular conclusion upon the whole or any part of the case, or to take away their exclusive right to weigh the evidence and determine the facts. The meaning of the provision is that the judge shall decide upon the law, and the jury upon the facts, and that the former shall not invade the province nor usurp the powers of the latter. The judge has no more right to control the opinion of the jury upon a matter of fact than the jury have to disregard the directions of the judge upon a matter of law." There is no question arising in a trial for murder more peculiarly or purely one of fact than the one whether the killing was done with deliberation and premeditation, or in the decision of which so much is necessarily left to the sound sense, discretion, and experience of the jury, who, under the constitution, are made the exclusive triers of that issue. In People v. Ah Lee, 60 Cal. 86, this court said: "And we think it to be well settled in this state that it was error to instruct the jury that there were no circumstances in the case to reduce the offense below that of murder in the first degree. The question whether the killing was perpetrated with the deliberation and premeditation necessary to constitute it murder in the first degree was one which it was peculiarly the province of the jury to determine." If the witnesses in this case had testified to a taking of the life of deceased under any of the circumstances enumerated by section 189 of the Penal Code as conclusive evidence of murder in the first degree, such as by means of poison, lying in wait, or torture, it may be that an instruction in the form given in the court below could be upheld; as, in that case, if the evidence were true, it could be said as a matter of law that the crime committed was murder in the first degree, because the act itself is made conclusive evidence of the fact that it was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. But the question arising upon the evidence here is far different; and whether the shooting of Leuy Jing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated was purely a question of fact, to be determined as an inference from all the circumstances surrounding the act, and was solely a matter for the jury to find and declare for themselves. No matter how clearly it may have appeared to the court that the circumstances or manner of the killing, as given by the witness, would, if truly given, furnish sufficient evidence of everything essential to make the killing murder in the first degree, still the constitution forbade the judge to announce his conclusion to the jury, and the defendant was entitled to have that question submitted for decision to the jury alone, as being the only persons authorized to pass upon it, and was entitled to a verdict based upon their own judgment, entirely uninfluenced by the opinion of the court as to what inferences of fact should be drawn from the evidence relating to this particular fact.

2. Nor are we permitted here to weigh the testimony for the purpose of determining whether the verdict of the jury is not right upon the evidence. What was said by the court in People v. Valencia, 43 Cal. 556, is in point here: "We are not justified in saying that the error was productive of no injury to the defendants, because we may be satisfied that the jury ought to have found from the evidence, as they did, that the defendants are guilty of murder in the first degree. The question as to the deliberation and premeditation of the defendants is one which is peculiarly the province of the jury to determine; and should we sustain the charge of the court because of the apparently satisfactory character of the evidence, that ques-

3. The error in this charge was not cured by this subsequent statement of the court: "I am not allowed to assist you in any way by suggestions on the testimony. And if you should think that there is any intimation of my opinion, or anything else, you should utterly disregard it. It is only your business to decide these questions of fact." This was not a withdrawal or a qualification of the former statement of the court that the killing of Luey Jing was murder in the first degree, if the witnesses for the prosecution were believed. Other parts of the charge are excepted to, but it is not necessary to pass upon any other assignment of error in the case. Judgment and order reversed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—PLEADING.

1. Where two separate buildings are constructed at different times, under different contracts between the owner and the same contractor, a mechanic's lien may be jointly filed against both, without specifying the amount due on each.

2. To render a judgment for a mechanic's lien valid, where the contract is not recorded, there must have been an allegation in the complaint, and a finding of the court, as to the value of the material furnished and the work done.

Affirming 23 Pac. Rep. 200.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 23 Pac. Rep. 200.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought by plaintiffs having several liens of mechanics and material-men against property owned by Pendola, deceased, in his life time. The findings show that Pendola entered into a written agreement with one Hamilton on March 29, 1887, for the construction of the Western Hotel, in the city of Santa Barbara, and on the 15th of June entered into another contract with said Hamilton to build a cottage near said hotel and on the same lot. Neither of these contracts was recorded. Belt & Co. furnished materials for both buildings, for which Hamilton agreed to pay a reasonable price. The court finds, that the reasonable value of the materials furnished by them was $363.99. On May 2, 1887, Hamilton entered into an agreement with Backus & Heyl, by the terms of which the latter were to paint the hotel for the sum of $365, and the cottage for the sum of $135. The court finds that of these sums $131.71 remains unpaid. Lightner & Buckingham furnished materials for, and performed certain work on, the cottage, for which Hamilton was to pay the sum of $335, and performed certain work on, and furnished materials for, the hotel, for which they were to receive the sum of $975, of which the sum of $535.35 remains due and unpaid.

1. The claims of lien filed by Backus & Heyl and Lightner & Buckingham segregate and specify the amounts which they were to be paid on each building, and state the total of the amounts paid to them and the balance due on both buildings. It is not stated, either in the complaint or in the findings, how much remains due on each of the buildings, and the question is presented whether a joint lien can be filed against two buildings where they are separate structures which have been erected at different times, and under different contracts between the owner and the original contractor. It seems to be conceded that a joint lien may be filed against two buildings erected at the same time and under the same contract. We think there can be no doubt that such is the case; and whatever may be the rights of an original contractor, having constructed two separate buildings under two separate and valid contracts, we think that in the case at bar the only effect of the failure to state how much labor and material was furnished one building, and how much the other, is to postpone the liens of these claimants and give precedence to the liens of others.

2. The complaint alleges that Hamilton agreed to pay Backus & Heyl the sums of $365 and $135, above referred to, and that he agreed to pay Buckingham & Lightner the sum of $975 for work done on, and material furnished for, the hotel, and $335 on account of the cottage; but it is nowhere alleged, nor does the court find, what was the value of any of the materials furnished or any of the work performed. Such allegations and findings were necessary, and the judgment cannot be supported without them. The contract between the owner and Hamilton was never filed for record. It was void, and while it is doubtless true that the contract price agreed upon between Hamilton, the agent of the owner, and the material-men and laborers, is prima facie evidence of the value of the materials furnished and labor performed, and would support a finding of value, we think that an allegation and a finding on the subject are essential to support a judgment in actions of this character. All other points made by appellant and worthy of consideration were noticed by Mr. Justice McFarland in the opinion filed in department, (23 Pac. Rep. 200,) and we are satisfied with the conclusions therein reached.

Judgment as to plaintiffs Buckingham and Heyl is reversed, and the cause is remanded for new trial, with permission to amend their pleadings as they may be advised. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 14, 1891.)

WATER-RIGHTS—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

1. W., the owner of land in which a stream took its origin, made an agreement with K., the occupant of government land through which the stream flowed, whereby W. granted to K. the right to enter on W.'s land, and, by means of a ditch, conduct onto the upper part of K.'s land the water from said stream, for use for irrigating his land during two days of each week; and K. granted to W. the right to enter on the lands occupied by him, and dig such ditches as he wished to, to distribute the water over lands of W. Thereafter K. obtained title to the government land occupied by him, bought part of W.'s land above, through which the stream flowed, subject to a reservation of all water-rights, and from different sources acquired the lands below the lands which he occupied at the date of the contract. Plaintiff succeeded to the lands and water-rights of W.; defendant, to those of K. Held, that defendant could not claim water-rights under the contract and also as riparian owner through the subsequent purchases along the lower part of the stream. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

2. On the land purchased from W. by K., defendant, and not plaintiff, has the right to develop water by digging wells, running tunnels, etc., so long as the natural flow of the stream is not interfered with.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

BEATTY, C. J. There is in the county of Los Angeles a natural stream issuing out of the Canada del Molino, and called "Mill Creek," which flows southward from the mouth of the Canada towards the town of Alhambra. In the year 1860, the land embracing the source of Mill creek, and extending to and including the mouth of the Canada, belonged to B. D. Wilson; south of and adjoining the land of Wilson, and including the lower course of Mill creek, was a tract of government land, embracing 154 acres, occupied by E. J. C. Kewen. Mill creek flowed across this tract and upon other vacant land of the United States. In its ordinary stages, and in its natural condition, the stream flowed but a short distance below the land occupied by Kewen. In order to irrigate higher portions of his land and get a head for conducting water to his house under pressure, it was necessary for Kewen to divert water from the stream on the lands of Wilson, and it was also convenient for Wilson to conduct a portion, at least, of the water used by him in irrigation across the lands occupied by Kewen. Under these circumstances, Wilson and wife on the one side, and Kewen and wife on the other, entered into the following contract: "This indenture, made this seventh day of May, A. D. 1860, between Benjamin D. Wilson and Margaret, his wife, of the first part, and Edward J. C. Kewen and Fannie, his wife, of the second part. Whereas, the said Benjamin D. Wilson is the owner of a certain tract of land called the 'Rincon de San Pasqual,' situate in the county of Los Angeles, the boundaries of which, are set out and described and are known to the parties hereto; and whereas, there is a certain stream of water, which takes its rise upon said tract of land and flows through a glen or Canada, called 'Canada del Molino,' or 'Mill Stream,' which glen is the glen which is in front of the old mill formerly possessed by the mission of San Gabriel, and being upon the banks of a certain fresh-water lake called 'Lake Vineyard,' which stream, after passing through the said glen, flows over the boundary line of the said tract of land called 'Rincon de San Pasqual,' and on and upon the lands outside thereof; and whereas, the said parties of the second part possess certain lands outside of and bounding on said boundary lines, upon which they are desirous of bringing the said water flowing in said Mill stream, to which the said Benjamin D. Wilson is willing to consent in the manner and mode and for the considerations hereinafter expressed: Now, therefore, this indenture witnesseth, that the parties of the first part for and in consideration of the grants and privileges to said Wilson hereinafter made, and of the free, effective, and undisturbed enjoyment thereof, have granted, released, remised, and conveyed, and by these presents do grant, release, remise, and convey to the parties of the second part the right of entry for themselves and servants in, over, and upon those certain lands, being in the county of Los Angeles and in the tract of land called 'Rincon de San Pasqual,' which said tract of land has been finally surveyed by the United States surveyor general, which said certain lands are those lying within and on the western side of the glen or Canada, called the 'Canada del Molino,' or 'Mill Stream,' the mouth whereof is to the northward of the old mill formerly occupied by the mission of San Gabriel, near the lake now called 'Lake Vineyard;' and after entry thereupon the right of guiding and conducting for two days in each week, commencing Friday and continuing through Saturday—that is, Friday and Saturday of each week—the water flowing in said glen, along the western side, in the upper water ditch now existing therein, a portion whereof was dug and opened in the fall of last year, together with the privilege of keeping the same in repair, the right of digging earth therein, and after guiding and conducting said water along said ditch, as aforesaid, the exclusive right to use and distribute the same for the purpose of irrigating their lands during the said two days in each week: provided, nevertheless, that when the said waters shall not be used for the irrigation of the lands aforesaid, that then they shall be permitted to flow in the manner and mode as directed by said Wilson. To have and to hold the said right of entry as aforesaid and the privileges thereunto annexed to the said parties of the second part, or either of them, owner or owners of the land now occupied by them, and to their or his heirs forever. And the parties of the second part, for and in consideration of the grant hereinbefore made, have given, granted, remised, released, and confirmed, and by these presents do give, grant, remise, release, and confirm to said Benjamin D. Wilson and his heirs and assigns a right of entry for himself and his servants in and upon all the lands now occupied by them, called the 'Rancho del Molino,' being the same tract of land hereinbefore referred to, for the purpose of opening new water ditches upon and through the said lands, or of using those already opened, and for the purpose of erecting and building aqueducts or flumes, or of using those already erected, and of keeping the said water ditches, flumes, or aqueducts in repair, and for these purposes the right to dig earth; also the right of way in and upon said lands for the purpose of guiding and conducting said water as the said Wilson may desire or wish, through said water ditches, flumes, or aqueducts now or to be opened or built upon or over the said lands in such directions, along such levels, and in such manner and mode as may seem to him expedient and useful, but not so as to wantonly and uselessly injure them, the parties of the second part and either of them shall permit to flow except as hereinafter specified, without disturbance, diminution, or injury, through and over their said lands along the said water ditches, flumes, or aqueducts, to such point or points outside thereof as the said Wilson may from time to time select; subject, nevertheless, to the right of the parties of the second part to use the water for irrigation of the said lands now occupied by them, flowing in the upper or higher ditch, or in any water ditch, flume, or aqueduct used, dug, or erected by the said parties of the first part upon the lands of the parties of the second part, or either of them, as aforesaid, during the two days hereinafter specified, and subject to their further right to conduct so much of the water in the upper ditch at any time when it may be flowing therein through a pipe two inches in diameter as may be sufficient to fill the same for the purposes of domestic use and for the playing of a fountain. And all the parties hereto mutually covenant to perform all the obligations herein contracted, and agree that the agreements and stipulations herein shall bind as well themselves as their heirs, executors, and administrators and assigns. In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. B. D. WILSON. [Seal.] MARGARET WILSON. [Seal.] E. J. C. KEWEN. [Seal.] FANNIE KEWEN. [Seal.]" Subsequently Kewen acquired the title to the government land occupied by him, and he also acquired 50 acres, including the mouth of the canal from Wilson, subject to a reservation of all water-rights, and from different sources he acquired the lands along the course of the stream below and adjoining the land which he claimed and occupied at the date of the contract. All these lands and all his rights under the contract were thereafter sold and duly transferred to the defendant. The plaintiff has acquired certain lands from Wilson, and succeeded to all his rights under the contract. Both parties have continuously claimed and asserted, and in this action are claiming and asserting, the rights secured to their respective predecessors by the contract, and none other. But they differ widely as to its proper construction, and the defendant is using water at times and for purposes which the plaintiff contends are in excess of his rights, and injurious to it.

This action was brought to determine the respective rights of the parties in the waters of the stream. The superior court sustained the claims of the plaintiff, and made a decree declaring and establishing its rights, and enjoining the defendant from infringing the rights so established. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The assignment of error principally relied on is that the superior court gave an erroneous construction to the contract of May 7, 1860. But we think the court construed the contract according to the intention of the parties, as shown not only by its terms, but by their subsequent action under it. They seem to have acted upon the assumption that they had a right to divide between themselves the entire flow of the stream, and their agreement, though inartificially drawn and most awkwardly expressed, clearly evinces that such was their intention. Nor can it be urged against this construction that it imputes to the parties an intention to do that which they had no right to do. For, so far as appears, they were at that time the sole occupants of the lands bordering the stream, and the lands through which it flowed after leaving the lands of Kewen belonged to the United States. Such being the case, they had a right to appropriate the entire stream for any beneficial purpose. Evidently they contemplated such an appropriation for the purpose of irrigating the land then in possession of Kewen, and, subject to the limited rights secured to him by the terms of their agreement, for the further purpose of irrigating any lands owned, or thereafter to be acquired, by Wilson, whether riparian to the stream or not. There was nothing unlawful or improper in such an agreement, or in such appropriation and diversion of the water, as between themselves, or as against the United States. It was held by the superior court, correctly, as we think, that by the contract Wilson and his successors acquired, as against Kewen, and those claiming under him, the right to use all the waters of the stream and to divert the same to lands not riparian, subject only to the rights of Kewen, as defined by the contract, i. e., the right to use the entire flow of the stream on Friday and Saturday of each week for the irrigation of the land owned or occupied by him at the date of the contract, the right to maintain his ditch and divert the water on the land of Wilson, the right to draw water therefrom, whenever it might be flowing therein, for domestic purposes, and for playing a fountain, to the capacity of a two-inch pipe, and the right to use the ditches, pipes, and works of Wilson, situated on his land, for the purposes of irrigation on Fridays and Saturdays. It was also correctly held by the superior court that Wilson, in his conveyance to Kewen of the 50-acre tract, reserved all water-rights then possessed by him, whether dependent on the contract or appurtenant to the land conveyed. But it is contended by the appellant that since he has become the owner of the lands bordering on the stream below the land owned or occupied by Kewen at the date of the contract, he has, as a riparian proprietor, a right to insist upon his share of the waters of the stream for the irrigation of those lands, independent of and superior to any rights of any party under the contract. But he cannot at the same time claim under the contract and against it. As above stated, the case shows that he, as well as his predecessor, Kewen, has always claimed and exercised the rights secured by the contract and wholly dependent upon it. In his answer in this case he makes no claim as a riparian owner, but relies on his construction of the contract. We do not see how he could maintain positions so inconsistent, even if his claim as a riparian owner was clearly well founded. But he seems to have acquired all his riparian land through Kewen. If this is so—if Kewen, after entering into the contract with Wilson, acquired title to the lands below him—his riparian rights as owner of such land became subordinated to the rights he had granted to Wilson by the contract. At least, it is certain he could not at the same time insist upon rights as a riparian owner inconsistent with the right he had granted to Wilson, and at the same time claim and exercise rights granted by Wilson upon no other consideration than his own grant to him. He could not at the same time enjoy the benefits of his contract and repudiate its burden. But, as we have seen, both Kewen and the defendant have always claimed under the contract, and to that they must look for a definition of their rights. In one particular, however, the findings and the decree are unwarranted by the evidence and by a proper construction of the contract and deed from Wilson to Kewen conveying the 50-acre tract. It is found as a fact, and decreed accordingly, that plaintiff, as successor to Wilson, has a right to develop water on the 50-acre tract, and that the defendant has no right to develop water thereon. We do not think that plaintiff has any such right, if by developing water is meant the digging of wells, running of tunnels, and the like. Nor do we think that the defendant is precluded, as successor of Kewen, either by the deed or contract, from digging wells, running tunnels, etc., on the 50-acre tract for the purpose of obtaining water, so long as he does not thereby interfere with or perceptibly diminish the natural flow of the stream. The decree of the superior court should be modified, so far as necessary, to bring it in harmony with these views. The cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify its decree accordingly, and as so modified it will stand affirmed; the appellant to recover costs of the appeal.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I concur in the judgment in so far as it directs a modification of the decree, but am unable to concur with the majority in the construction of the contract between the Wilsons and the Kewens. I am unable to see in that contract an intention on the part of the parties thereto to convey or partition their water-rights. The object of the contract was to secure water for the tract of land then owned by the respective parties. Wilson could not get it upon his land—portions of his land—without crossing the lands of Kewen. Kewen could not get it upon certain portions of his land, which he desired to irrigate, without the use of the ditch he had constructed on Wilson's land. It seems that Wilson never used this ditch, but he could get water on his land lying east of Lake Vineyard by ditches, flumes, and aqueducts, through which to carry the water upon and across Kewen's land. Each granted to the other an easement for the purpose of conducting the water upon his land. In fixing the time each was to use the water, they did not necessarily convey any water-right, and, in the absence of an intention to do so clearly appearing in express and unequivocal terms, it should not be held that they did. If a third person had purchased the land lying below the 154.32 acres owned by Kewen, he certainly would not have been bound by the contract between Wilson and Kewen. He could have maintained his right to the use of the waters of the stream as a riparian proprietor, notwithstanding the fact that the stream had its source on the lands of Wilson. Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 179; Canal Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 311; Gould v. Stafford, 77 Cal. 68, 18 Pac. Rep. 879. As between themselves, of course, Wilson and Kewen could dispose of their water-rights as they chose; but they could not affect the rights of lower proprietors, and I am unable to see how the defendant can be estopped from claiming the same right that any other purchaser of the land below the Kewen lands would have had as a riparian owner. If he had owned the lower tract at the time the contract was entered into by Wilson and Kewen, or if he had purchased it before he purchased the Kewen tract, it does not seem to me that he would have lost his rights as a riparian owner of the first tract purchased, simply because his second grantor had entered into the contract with Wilson. I am at a loss to understand why he waived his riparian rights as owner of the lower tract by purchasing the Kewen tract. When he purchased the lower tract he took with the grant all the right that any other grantee could have taken. But, as stated before, it seems clear to me that the only object of the parties to the contract was to secure the right of way, each from the other, for conducting water across the land,—the agreement as to the time each was to use the water being a mere matter of convenience,—and the use of the water contemplated by the parties was confined to the lands then held by them. It may be, and doubtless is, true, that the defendant is entitled to use the water on the Kewen tract only in accordance with the terms of the contract between Wilson and Kewen, and that he would have no right to use the ditch or pipes located above for the purpose of conducting water upon the lower tract,—the tract below the land held by Kewen at the time the contract was made; but as to such lower tract, I think the defendant is entitled to use the water in the same manner as if no contract had ever been entered into between Wilson and Kewen, and as if defendant had never purchased the upper tract from Kewen. The defendant did not in express terms set up his right as a riparian proprietor in the lower tract, and there may be a doubt as to whether such right has been litigated herein. If the issues and the decree do not cover the rights of the defendant as riparian owner of the tract below, regardless of the contract, what I have said is inapplicable to the case; but it seems to me that the decree determines all the rights of the defendant to the use of the water, without regard to any particular tract of land. I therefore dissent from that portion of the judgment which sustains in part the decree of the court below.

WILSON et al. v. HILL. (No. 13,587.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

1. Defendants sold to plaintiff land and stock in a water company, representing that the water supply to which the stock entitled him was sufficient to irrigate the land and render it capable of producing crops. Held, that the representation was not a mere expression of opinion, but a material statement that there was a permanent and sufficient supply of water for irrigation.

2. Where certificates of stock are transferred by indorsement in blank, and not on the books of the company, an offer by the transferee to deliver them to the transferor on failure of the consideration is a sufficient tender.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

Waters & Gird, for appellant. Hargrove & Bledsoe and H. C. Rolfe, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The case of Hill v. Wilson and wife was brought to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendants for a balance of purchase money alleged to be due for the real estate described therein, sold by the plaintiff to the defendants. To this complaint the defendants pleaded that the plaintiff had induced them to purchase the land and execute the mortgage by certain false and fraudulent representations. The action of Wilson and wife against Hill was one to rescind the sale of the land by Hill to them and cancel the mortgage, on the same grounds set up in their answer as a defense to the action to foreclose the mortgage; so that the issues in the two cases were substantially the same. There was a demurrer to the answer in the foreclosure suit and to the complaint in the action to rescind, which presented the same question. By stipulation the two cases were consolidated and tried together, and are brought to this court in the same transcript. The evidence is the same in both cases, so far as it becomes material on this appeal. The court below found for the defendants in the foreclosure proceeding and for the plaintiff in the action to rescind, and in the latter case decreed that the mortgage be delivered up by the defendant, and that he repay the purchase money paid in

It is contended by the appellant that neither the answer in the first case nor the complaint in the last was good, because the representations alleged to have been made were not as to existing facts, but were mere opinions; that the offer to rescind was not made in time; and the tender made was not sufficient. The sale made by Hill was of the land, 45 shares of stock in a certain water company, 5 cords of wood, and a cow, for the sum of $6,000. The shares of stock entitle the holder to so much of the waters of a certain water-ditch, to be used for irrigation and domestic purposes, and was for that reason only valuable in connection with the land. The allegation as to the fraudulent representations was as follows: "The said plaintiff, for the purpose of inducing the defendants to purchase the land and water-right hereinabove described, did falsely and fraudulently and deceitfully represent to defendants, and did by such false, fraudulent, and deceitful representations induce defendants to believe, that the said land was well and abundantly watered by means of the said forty-five shares of said Timber Ditch Water Company, and the water to be furnished for use on said land by the said ditch that the said Timber Ditch would carry, and that there would be flowing therein during all the dry and irrigating season of the year from two to three hundred inches of water, measured under a four-inch pressure, which was and would be sufficient and ample to irrigate the whole of said land, so that the same would produce large and valuable crops of alfalfa and other grasses. And the defendants, relying upon and believing said representations to be true, entered into the contract for and made the purchase of said land and premises, as hereinabove stated, without making any other or further inquiry or examination as to the water supply aforesaid, believing and relying upon the statements and representations of said plaintiff with reference to the said water supply, and, being entirely unacquainted with that portion of the country, entered into said contract and made said purchase of the said land and water-right solely and exclusively upon the representations and statements of the plaintiff that the said land was well and abundantly supplied with water for the purpose of irrigation during all the dry and irrigating season, which was the sole and only inducement to defendants to purchase said premises. That the soil of said lands is dry and sandy in character, which, without an abundant supply of water for irrigation, is absolutely unfit for farming or agricultural purposes of any character whatever, which was well known to plaintiff." These were not the mere expressions of opinion. They were statements of very material and important facts, and such as were well calculated to induce the purchase. It was not a statement that there would be water from a certain stream or ditch, but that the ranch was well supplied with water. This was a statement of an existing supply of water. Nor could it be construed as a mere statement that at the time the representation was made it was supplied with sufficient water. To say that the ranch was well watered was equivalent to a statement that it had a supply of water sufficient to irrigate and produce crops at all proper seasons of the year; and this was expressly stated. The allegations were sufficient in this respect. The allegation was that the vendees discovered, by the failure of the water supply on the 20th of June, that the representations were false; and they offered to rescind, and tendered a reconveyance of the land, and to return the certificates of stock, on the 20th of August. This, we think, was a reasonable time within which to offer to rescind, and the cause cannot be reversed on this ground.

It is insisted that the tender on the offer to rescind was not sufficient because the cord-wood and the cow were not tendered, and the certificates of stock were not tendered in such form as to vest the title in Hill if the tender had been accepted. The allegation as to the tender is as follows: "Defendants further allege and aver that as soon as they discovered and became convinced of the falsity of the aforesaid representations of plaintiff in regard to the water belonging to and with said land, they offered in good faith to rescind the entire contract of sale and purchase of the said premises between plaintiff and the defendants, made on the 10th day of March, 1888, as aforesaid, and for that purpose defendants made, executed, and acknowledged a good and sufficient deed for the reconveyance to plaintiff by them of the land and premises aforesaid, and on or about the 20th day of August, 1888, and before the commencement of this action, they tendered said deed to plaintiff, and offered to give and surrender to him the full, peaceable, and quiet possession of said premises, and every part thereof, together with the said certificates for the forty-five shares of stock in the Timber Ditch Water Company, being the identical certificates thereupon indorsed, and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants as aforesaid; and defendants then and there demanded of the plaintiff a full rescission of the said contract of sale and purchase by and between the said plaintiff and defendants, and offered to restore to plaintiff all and every part of the said premises in as good state and condition as they were when defendants received the same, save and except such damage as the trees and other crops have suffered for want of water as aforesaid, and without any fault of defendants; and demanded of plaintiff the restoration and return to them of the full consideration paid on account of said sale and purchase, and of the notes and mortgage upon which plaintiff brings this suit; but to rescind the said contract the plaintiff then and there refused, and still refuses so to do, although well knowing that in equity and good conscience he ought to rescind the same." This was sufficient as to the land and water stock. It appears from the pleadings that the certificates of stock had been transferred to Wilson by an indorsement in blank. There does not appear to have been any transfer of the stock on the books of the company. This being so, an offer to redeliver the certificates to Hill was a sufficient tender of them. There was no direct allegation of a tender of the cord-wood or the cow. Counsel for appellant say there was no allegation of the value of the land or of the value of the personal property, and that the personal property not tendered might have been of the value of $6,000. We can hardly believe cord-wood and cows must come high in San Bernardino county. But when we look at the evidence we find that the cord-wood and the cow were really no part of the consideration for the purchase or the mortgage, and that they, being on the ranch, were "thrown in" in the trade. We think the general allegation of an "offer to rescind the entire contract of sale and purchase," together with the specific allegations set out above, rendered the pleadings both sufficient. In the judgment rendered the Wilsons were required to account for or return all of the property received by them. The allegations and findings of fraud are fully sustained by the evidence, and the findings support the judgment. Some objections are made to certain rulings in the admission and exclusion of evidence, but we find no error in the record. The judgments and orders in both of the cases are affirmed.

NAGLE V. CALIFORNIA SOUTH. R. CO. (No. 13,729.)

CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—ALIGHTING FROM TRAIN.

Plaintiff in an action against a railroad company for personal injuries had bought a ticket on defendant's road to his home, which was the third station from his starting point. At the third stop after the journey began, several passengers, bound for the same place as plaintiff, started up, one of them saying that it was their destination; and plaintiff, going onto the platform of the car, got off in the dark, and, after falling 15 feet into a canyon, discovered that the train had stopped on a trestle some distance from his station. No signal had been given for the stop, and it lasted only a minute or less, so that no one else had time to get off. One of plaintiff's witnesses testified that there had been a washout there; and it was not shown that it was so dark that plaintiff could not have noticed the canyon if he had taken the time to look. Held, that a nonsuit was properly granted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Deakin & Story, for appellant. Hunsaker & Britt, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries caused him by the alleged carelessness and negligence of the defendant. After the introduction of the plaintiff's evidence, a jury having been waived, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted. From the judgment rendered in the premises, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The facts, as they appear in the evidence of the plaintiff, are that on Sunday night, April 15, 1888, he was traveling on the defendant's railroad. Had bought his ticket at San Diego for La Jolla, a station on that road. He had been on this journey before in the day-time, and knew that at La Jolla there was a platform to get out upon, and that it had a shed over it, and the ground was level around the station at that point. In going from San Diego to La Jolla before, he knew the train had only made three stops,—at Old Town, Morena, and La Jolla. There were five other persons with him on the present trip, passengers to La Jolla. He did not know whether there were lights about La Jolla and the station at night. The train stopped some time at Old Town to water or coal. It then stopped at Morena. After this it again stopped. He did not "know what for." Everybody got astir in the car, and "the men allowed this was La Jolla." There was a kind of rush; that is, of the men in the car who had to get off at La Jolla, thinking they were there. The man along-side of the plaintiff stood up. The latter sat still until the train came to a stop. The man said: "You had better get out quick; the train don't stop a minute." The plaintiff got out, and in doing so "walked right off, and went down a canyon, as our car was standing on a trestle-work." He did not know how long this was after leaving Morena, or how far this place was from La Jolla. He thought he was walking down the steps to "the platform," instead of which he went down the canyon. He fell 10 or 12 feet. Nobody else got out. He sprained his ankle, and suffered other injuries. On cross-examination he did not seem to be certain that the train did stop at Morena, or how long. When the whistle blew he did not see the conductor, the latter having taken up the plaintiff's ticket before the train stopped; nor did he see any of the trainmen when he walked off. The whistle was blown sharply, but how many times he did not remember. On redirect examination he knew that the train stopped twice after leaving San Diego before reaching the trestle; once at Old Town, and once at Morena. The plaintiff thought the distance from where he walked off to La Jolla "must have been a couple of miles." His brother, also a witness for him, stated that he might be "in the neighborhood of a mile;" it may be a little more or less; and that he had heard it was about four miles between Morena and La Jolla. He and the other men in company thought the stop was for La Jolla. There had been no warning that they were going to stop, or that they must keep their seats. "From habit of getting off at the third stopping place we made the move to get off there." On cross-examination he thought the distance to La Jolla from where the plaintiff stepped off was more than a mile. He heard no whistle, and the train stopped on the trestle perhaps a minute. At the time the train stopped neither conductor nor trainmen were in the car. Three of the company went out at one door of the car and three at the other. Another witness for plaintiff testified that the night was rather dark. That the third stop, which they supposed to be La Jolla, was about midway between Morena and La Jolla; that is, about two miles from either place. He did not know what the train stopped for at the third point. It was "no stopping place at all. It was just simply a stopping place for the train." He got up to get off at a different door from the plaintiff, but did not get off. He thought it "pretty hard to look the length of the car and tell the parties and recognize them." He did not think the train stopped at the trestle over 15 seconds. It was just about time enough to come to a standstill and move on. "It only came to a standstill and moved." He "judged" the trestle was about midway between Morena and La Jolla. He heard none of the trainmen say it was La Jolla. There was no station called or mentioned by any of them. Another witness swore that the train stopped at Old Town; then at another little station. "After that they stopped where there had been a washout. They had been working there; and they never 'hollered' for a station. They kind of checked up there. It was dark. We started to get off. Mr. Nagle [the plaintiff] got off, and when he got off he fell. They started so quick that he, having some bundles to gather up, did not have time to get off." From all this it appears that the cause of the stoppage of the train was a proper one, that due care might be taken of the whole train and all the passengers on it. As the train was approaching a washout, where danger might exist, it was the duty of the conductor and trainmen to be at their several stations,—at the brakes and on the lookout,—to see that there was no injury likely to result in passing this dangerous spot on the road. They could not perform this in the short time of the stoppage, and also go through the cars to warn passengers not to get out; for this stoppage lasted at the most a minute, or, as a witness said, not more than "fifteen seconds." If they had acted as the plaintiff seems to contend they should, an accident had happened to the train, and injuries been received by the passengers, then the negligence of the defendant would have been apparent. It was evidently the habit—that of making the third stop at La Jolla—that induced the plaintiff and his companions to rush for the door, and the former to jump out so quickly as not either to attempt to look about and see if he was at La Jolla, or apparently to use any sort of precaution in seeking to ascertain at what kind of a place he was stepping off. It appears that no one else got off; and, conceding that the two persons immediately behind the plaintiff did not get off because he had stepped off into the canyon, yet it still appears that none of the three at the other door of the car got off, probably because they saw they were not at La Jolla, or that the place of the stoppage was not a proper place at which to get off. It does not appear to have been so dark but that a person by the proper use of his eyes might have distinguished a canyon lying immediately before him, 10 or 15 feet deep, from a level place, where there was a platform and shed over it, which were to be seen at La Jolla. Instead of attempting to do this, the plaintiff heedlessly jumped off the car, and could not have taken time to look about him, as it would appear. The defendant cannot be held to the responsibility of warranting the safety of the plaintiff at all events. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 585, 586, 22 Pac. Rep. 266. It is "responsible, as far as human care and foresight will go, for the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and therefore for the slightest neglect." 80 Cal. 595, 22 Pac. Rep. 272. It was for the court, on the undisputed facts, to determine if the defendant was guilty or not of contributory negligence. Glascock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 187, 14 Pac. Rep. 518. And even if the burden of proof is on the defendant to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, this does not preclude a judgment "by way of nonsuit, whenever the evidence of the plaintiff so conclusively establishes a defense as that the court would grant a new trial in case of a verdict in his favor upon like evidence." McQuilken v. Railroad Co., 59 Cal. 8. The plaintiff had no intimation from the trainmen that this was his stopping place, or that he should get off; but got off apparently because some irresponsible person said it was La Jolla, and perhaps because of the habit of persons getting off there usually as the third stopping place from San Diego. He got off in the dark, when the best use of one's eyes is necessary; and we must suppose that his were good. He should at least have used them, acting, as he was, upon his own responsibility, with sufficient care to have "looked before he leaped." This is the rule, as we think, announced in Flemming v. Railroad Co., 49 Cal. 257; Glascock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 140, 14 Pac. Rep. 518. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

ATTACHMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF WRIT—POSTING COPY.

1. A writ of attachment cannot be held insufficient on appeal because of an alleged recital therein, where it is not shown by bill of exceptions, and the only thing that appears is an objection by counsel, in which he recites a portion of the writ.

2. The addition of the words "or thereabouts" after the amount of the demand in a writ of attachment does not render the proceeding void on collateral attack under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 540, requiring writs of attachment to state "the amount" of plaintiff's demand.

3. Where a writ in attachment was posted on the side of a house next a street, the house being near a corner, and there being a vacant lot opposite the side of the house, and two witnesses testify that the notice could be easily and plainly

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; G. G. CLOUGH, Judge.

Park Henshaw and Grey & Sexton, for appellant. John Gale, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Suit to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The parties stipulated that the only questions to be determined is whether a certain attachment, under which the plaintiff claims, was properly levied upon the lot in controversy. Upon the former appeal it was held that the return was prima facie sufficient. 72 Cal. 494, 14 Pac. Rep. 102. The defendant now urges two reasons why the levy should be held to be insufficient.

1. It is argued that the writ was insufficient in that it did not state "the amount" of the plaintiff's demand, as required by section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but stated that the action was to recover $620 "or thereabouts." We are inclined to doubt whether this question is open for consideration under the stipulation. Assuming that it is open, there is no foundation for it in the record. It appears that the writ was introduced in evidence, but it is not shown by the bill of exceptions. The only thing that appears is an objection by counsel, in the course of which he recites a portion of the writ. This is not a sufficient mode of showing a fact. If it be assumed to be sufficient, it only purports to be a part of the writ; non constat, but that the remainder of the writ was amply sufficient in the respect referred to. And if the fact was shown to be as the appellant says it is, we do not think that the words "or thereabouts," after the amount of the demand, renders the attachment proceedings void upon a collateral attack.

2. It is said that the evidence shows that the writ was not posted "in a conspicuous place," as required by section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The finding is that the notice was posted in a conspicuous place; and the evidence shows conclusively that this was so. The house was near a corner formed by two streets, and on the east side was a vacant lot. The east side was the "long side." The notice was posted on this side, within five or six feet of the street. The contention is that it ought to have been posted on the front of the house. The sheriff testifies that "anybody could see it that would go by;" that "it was the most suitable place—conspicuous place—I could find;" and that it was the safest place to put the papers "so that they would stay placed." (Another witness testified that the papers posted could readily be seen; "no trouble to see them. One could scarce pass without seeing the papers, if they were looking at all.") There was no evidence to the contrary. The appellant says that the testimony of these two witnesses was materially weakened on cross-examination, but we do not think so. The statute does not require that the notice should be posted in "the most" conspicuous place, but only in a conspicuous place; but, if it did, we should not be able to say that the evidence did not show that the place chosen was not as conspicuous as any other. We think that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, with damages.

COLE V. SEGRAVES. (No. 13,839.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 18, 1891.)

EJECTMENT—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

1. A complaint in ejectment, filed December 4, 1889, which alleges that on December 20, 1888, plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the premises sued for, and "that on the 24th day of December, 1889, plaintiff being so seised and possessed, defendant wrongfully entered and ousted plaintiff from the possession thereof, and now withholds wrongfully the possession," is not objectionable on general demurrer as alleging ouster subsequent to the filing of the complaint, as it is evident that this was a clerical error merely, and is inconsistent with the allegation that defendant "now withholds," etc.

2. Where the complaint alleges that the demanded premises are in Susanville it is not objectionable because it does not allege that they are in Lassen county, where the action is brought, as the court will take judicial notice that Susanville is in Lassen county, under the provision of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1875, subd. 2, that courts take judicial notice of whatever is established by law.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

Shinn & Masten, for appellant. Spencer & Raker and Clarence A. Raker, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Ejectment. Defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. His demurrer having been sustained, and plaintiff declining to amend, final judgment was entered dismissing the action, and for costs. Plaintiff appeals. The complaint consists of two parts, in the first of which there is an attempt to set up a valid title in plaintiff to the demanded premises founded on a sale for delinquent taxes. The second part of the complaint contains the general allegations usual in actions of this character. Various objections are made to the validity of the tax-title first set out; but we find it unnecessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the facts alleged to constitute a good title. The second part of the complaint is sufficient in itself to show a cause of action, and the first part may be treated as surplusage. It is alleged that on the 20th day of December, 1888, plaintiff was the owner and in the possession of the demanded premises, and "that on the 24th day of December, 1889, plaintiff being so seised and possessed, the defendant wrongfully entered and ousted plaintiff from the possession thereof, and now withholds wrongfully the possession," etc. The complaint was filed December 4, 1889, and, as will be observed, the allegation is of an entry and ouster on the 24th day of December, 1889. This allegation of an ouster subsequent to the filing of the complaint is relied upon as justifying the order sustaining the demurrer. But it is evident on the face of the complaint that there is a clerical error in this allegation, and that it should have read "1888" instead of "1889." The latter date is inconsistent with the other part of the same allegation that the defendant "now withholds." The most that can be said of this inconsistency is that it rendered the complaint ambiguous or uncertain, and the only way in which advantage could have been taken of it was by special demurrer on that ground. Upon general demurrer, controlling force should have been given in construing the complaint to the words "now withholds," which show an ouster prior to the filing of the complaint.

There was no demurrer on the ground of want of jurisdiction, but respondent claims the right to object to the complaint on that ground at any stage of the proceedings, and he calls our attention to the fact that there is no allegation in the complaint that the demanded premises are in Lassen county. But it is alleged that they are in the town of Susanville; and not only the superior court, but this court, takes judicial notice that Susanville is the county seat of Lassen county. Code Civil Proc. § 1875, subd. 2.<sup>1</sup>

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to the superior court to overrule the demurrer, and allow the defendant a reasonable time to answer.

APPEAL—SERVICE OF NOTICE—AMENDMENT.

Where an affidavit of service by mail states that the "within notice was deposited" in the post-office at a certain place, directed to respondent's attorneys at a specified place; that respondent's attorneys "reside" there, and appellant's attorneys "reside" at the former place; and that there "is" regular communication between the two places,—an amendment will be allowed to make the notice referred to more definite, and to show the residence of the respective attorneys at the date thereof.

The affidavit is uncertain as to the notice referred to, and, as it was made on the 10th of February, 1890, it fails to show the places of residence of the respective attorneys on

February 8th, and, strictly construed, is insufficient, (Doerfler v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 265;) but as the defect is one arising, doubtless, out of a careless use of language, and the objection being rather technical, we deem it a proper exercise of our discretion to grant the appellant's request to file another affidavit of service. The court should be liberal in granting amendments which can cause the respondent no injustice, and which will secure to the appellant a hearing on the merits. If a sufficient affidavit of service is filed within five days from date hereof, the motion to dismiss will be denied; otherwise it will be granted.

PEOPLE V. FOWLER. (No. 20,714.)

PROSTITUTION—ABDUCTION—INFORMATION.

1. An information alleging that defendant unlawfully took away a certain unmarried female under the age of 18 years from the custody of her mother, without the latter's consent, and against her will, for purposes of prostitution, is sufficient under Pen. Code Cal. § 267, which provides that every person who takes away any female under the age of 18 years, "from her father, mother, guardian, or other person having the legal charge of her person, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, is punishable," etc., without alleging that the female's mother had "legal charge" of her person.

2. It is not necessary to allege that defendant knew that the female was under 18 years of age.

3. The misplacing of the concluding words of the information after instead of before a charge of prior conviction is immaterial, as it "does not tend to the prejudice of the substantial right of the defendant," within the meaning of Pen. Code Cal. §§ 960, 1258.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. Walter B. Cope, Dist. Atty., and George H. Johnson, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The information charges that the defendant, on the 12th day of June, 1889, "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take away one Rosa Keep, then and there being an unmarried female under the age of 18 years, to-wit, of the age of 14 years, from and out of the custody of Maria Keep, her mother, without the consent and against the will of her said mother, for the purpose of prostitution." Section 267 of the Penal Code provides: "Every person who takes away any female under the age of 18 years from her father, mother, guardian, or other person having the legal charge of her person, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, is punishable," etc. The information follows the language of the statute, and is sufficient. It alleges all the acts and facts which the legislature has said shall constitute the offense, and is direct and certain, both as to the party charged and the particular offense charged. These are the tests of sufficiency in matters of averment. It was not necessary to allege that the mother had the "legal charge" of the person of the girl. One who takes a minor female from the actual custody of her mother for the purpose of prostitution should not be heard to say that as between the mother and the father the latter may have had the better right to the custody of the child, and may have given his consent. So long as the child was in the actual custody of the mother, the latter was bound by every principle of law, humanity, and parental care to protect her person, and had the legal charge of her person within the meaning of the statute. Bish. St. Crimes, § 633.

It is claimed that the information is defective because it is not alleged that the defendant knew the girl was under age. We think that under this statute the people are not bound to allege or prove that the defendant knew the girl was under 18 years of age. "The gist of the offense is the taking away of the child against the will of the person having lawful charge of her, for the purpose of prostitution;" and one who does so acts at his peril, and cannot defend himself on the plea of ignorance as to the age of the child. Id. § 632. The law was intended to protect the family against the assaults of those who traffic in women for houses of prostitution,—to save the members thereof from sorrow and disgrace; and the court ought to be careful not to construe the statute so as to deprive it of any element of effectiveness in this regard. People v. Demousset, 71 Cal. 613, 12 Pac. Rep. 788. Appellant urges that "penal statutes are to be construed strictly in those parts which are against defendants, but liberally in those which are in their favor." Such is always the contention made, and too often followed; but it is no longer the rule. In former days, when the law-maker acted upon the idea that penal legislation was an important factor in shaping the morals of the people, many acts trivial in their consequences were declared criminal, and cruel punishments (whipping, and even death) were imposed on conviction of offenses which are now regarded as mere misdemeanors. The courts, as conservators of the natural and inalienable rights of the citizen, found it expedient and just in the administration of the law to strictly construe the provisions of penal statutes, and to resolve every doubtful question of construction in favor of the person charged. But the reason for such a rule of construction is no longer existent, and in this state it has been repudiated by express legislative enactment. Section 4 of the Penal Code provides: "The rule of the common law, that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of its terms, with a view to effect its object and promote justice."

The concluding words of the information are evidently misplaced, and should have been inserted before instead of after the charge of prior conviction, but such misplacement, being a matter of mere form, "does not tend to the prejudice of the substantial right of the defendant," and is therefore immaterial. Sections 960, 1258, Pen. Code; People v. Biggins, 65 Cal. 564, 4 Pac. Rep. 570. It doubtless occurred through the use of a blank information with the usual clause, contra formam statuti. The judgment is regular on its face, (section 1207, Pen. Code,) and the court properly took into consideration the prior conviction pleaded and confessed, as shown by the record. Ex parte Young Ah Gow, 73 Cal. 438, 15 Pac. Rep. 76; People v. Meyer, 73 Cal. 548, 15 Pac. Rep. 95. Other points made by appellant are not well taken, because the appeal is from the judgment only, and there is no bill of exceptions. Everything complained of may have been done with the consent or at the request of the defendant, in which event, of course, he could not be heard to complain. Judgment affirmed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. Where the complaint in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien alleges that the claim for a lien was duly recorded, and states its contents substantially in the language of the statute requiring such claim, but the claim as recorded was inartificially drawn, and not in the language of the complaint, a denial in the answer that the claim contains the necessary averments is sufficient to raise an issue as to the alleged claim, though such denial is made on information and belief.

2. Where plaintiffs have introduced evidence that the work for which they claim a lien was well done, defendants are entitled to show that it was not done in a good and workman-like manner.

3. Error in excluding evidence may be considered on appeal, though the ruling was not specified in the bill of exceptions, since, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 650, it is not necessary that appellant should specify therein the particular errors of law on which he will rely.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Harris & Ward and A. G. Wooster, for appellants. John M. Lucas, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a lien for work and materials used in painting a house erected for the defendant Ellen L. Williams. The complaint states that the defendants were husband and wife; that Mrs. Williams owned a lot of land, and on a day named entered into a contract with certain builders to furnish all the materials and labor, and erect for her a dwelling-house on the lot; that the contractors commenced the construction of the house, and afterwards made a contract with the plaintiff and one Anderson, under and by which they were to furnish the materials and perform the labor of painting the house, and were to be paid therefor the sum of $155; that upon the making of this contract Mrs. Williams promised and agreed with the painters that she herself would pay and guaranty payment of the sum of money to become due them under their contract, and would also pay them any and all further sums which might become due them for extra work on the house; that the painters entered upon the performance of their contract, and fully performed and complied with all the conditions of the same, and at the request of Mrs. Williams furnished materials and did extra work of the value of $26; that the full amount due under the contract, and for extra work, which Mrs. Williams promised and agreed to pay, was $181, of which sum $107 had been paid, leaving still due and unpaid the sum of $74; that the house was finished, and in due time the painters filed and had recorded a claim of lien, which was duly verified, and stated all the facts required by statute to be stated in such a case; and that subsequently Anderson duly assigned and transferred to the plaintiff all his claim and demand under the lien, and against the said property and defendants. The defendants, by their answer, denied that they, or either of them, promised or agreed to pay Anderson and Hagman for the work done under their contract, or to guaranty payment thereof, or to pay for any extra work in any manner whatever; denied that Anderson and Hagman, or either of them, fully performed all the conditions of their contract, or of any contract, mentioned in the complaint, or complied with the same; and on information and belief denied that the instrument filed and recorded by Anderson and Hagman as a claim of lien, "contains a statement of their demand, or any demand, with the names of the person or persons by whom they were employed, or of any employment, or to whom they furnished materials; or of any materials, with a statement of the terms, time given, or conditions of their contract, or of any contract." The case was tried, and all the facts were found by the court to be as alleged in the complaint. Judgment was then entered, foreclosing the lien and awarding the plaintiff $50 as a reasonable attorney's fee, and costs, as prayed for in the complaint. The defendants moved for a new trial upon a bill of exceptions, which was duly settled and filed. The motion was denied, and they appealed from the judgment and order.

It is objected for respondent that the order denying the new trial cannot be considered, for the reason that the record contains no copy of the order. The objection cannot be sustained. The record shows that after the order was made a second bill of exceptions was settled and filed, setting out that the motion was made by the defendants, pursuant to their notice of intention to move for a new trial, on certain grounds stated, and that both the plaintiff and defendants appeared by their attorneys; that the first bill of exceptions and certain affidavits were used on the hearing, and then, that "the court, having heard the argument of counsel, and being fully advised, doth order that said motion for new trial be, and the same is hereby, denied." And the clerk certifies that the record contains correct and complete copies of the records and documents on file in the case, and, among others, of the last bill of exceptions, "including the order refusing a new trial." This was sufficient to meet the requirements of section 952 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is contended by appellants that the judgment should be reversed because of errors committed by the court in its rulings. The proceedings were as follows: On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence his claim of lien, and the defendants objected to the admission of the paper, on the ground that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." The court overruled the objection, and admitted the paper in evidence, on the ground, as stated, that the answer contained no denials of the allegations of the complaint in regard to the claim of lien, but admitted each of them. The defendants excepted to this ruling, and thereupon counsel for plaintiff announced to the court that the offer of the lien in evidence was withdrawn, and the court ordered that it be considered withdrawn. No other or further evidence relating to the notice and claim of lien alleged in the complaint was offered by either party. Subsequently the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that the work alleged in the complaint was done in a good and workman-like manner, considering the quality and amount of material called for by the contract. When the defendants were making their case, they offered evidence to show that the work sued for was not performed in a good and workman-like manner. To this offer the plaintiff objected, on the ground of irrelevancy, incompetency, and immateriality, and the court sustained the objection, and excluded the evidence, defendants reserving an exception. The defendants then, when they had nearly closed their testimony, asked leave to amend their answer by making specific positive denials of each and every allegation of the complaint, relating to the contents of the alleged notice of lien, and by adding averments that the material used in painting the house was of inferior quality, and not such as was called for in the contract, and that the work was done in a bad and unworkman-like manner, and inefficiently, and that by reason of such inferior workmanship and material the defendants were damaged in the sum of $100. The court denied the application to amend, and the defendants duly excepted.

1. The first ruling complained of was evidently based upon the theory that the denials in the answer as to the claim of lien were insufficient to raise any issue, because they were made upon information and belief. In this case, we think the learned judge of the court below mistaken. It is true that, where facts are alleged in a verified complaint which are presumptively within the personal knowledge of the defendant, he is not permitted to deny them upon information and belief, but must answer positively. Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 62; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. Rep. 844. Here the allegations were as to a written instrument which had been recorded in the recorder's office of the county, and they stated its contents substantially in the language of the statute which provides for the making and recording of such an instrument. Section 1187, Code Civil Proc. But an inspection of the paper shows at once that it was inartificially drawn, and not in the language of the complaint. A question, then, might well arise as to whether or not it was sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute and to create a lien; and that such a question did arise is shown by the fact that counsel here earnestly insist, on one side, that it was wholly insufficient, and, on the other, that it was fully sufficient, to effect the purposes intended by it. Under these circumstances we do not think it can be said that, because the defendants might have seen and read the record, they must be presumed to have such knowledge of the facts alleged in the complaint as to require positive denials if they deemed them untrue. Our conclusion is that the denials on information and belief were sufficient to raise an issue as to the alleged claim of lien.

2. We also think the court erred in excluding the evidence offered by the defendants to show that the work sued for was not performed in a good and workman-like manner. The plaintiff had introduced evidence to prove that the work was well done, and it seems clear that the defendants had a right to disprove that fact if they could. It is objected for respondent that this point cannot be considered, because the ruling is not specified in the bill of exceptions, as an error upon which the parties would rely. But specifications of the particular errors of law on which the appellant will rely are not necessary in a bill of exceptions. Code Civil Proc. § 650; Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 18 Pac. Rep. 403.

3. It is to be regretted that a case involving so small a sum should be permitted to occupy so much of the time of the courts, and as, in consequence of the errors above spoken of, it must go back for a new trial, it is proper to state that we have carefully examined the paper introduced in evidence by the plaintiff as his claim of lien, and are of the opinion that it should be treated and held to be sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. A substantial compliance with the statute is all that is necessary. Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 78, 13 Pac. Rep. 152; Malone v. Mining Co., 76 Cal. 578, 18 Pac. Rep. 772; Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 144, 23 Pac. Rep. 139.

We advise that the judgment and order be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if they shall be so advised.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1891.)
VENDOR AND VENDEE—QUITCLAIM—SCHOOL-LAND CERTIFICATE OF PURCHASE.

1. Defendant's grantor executed an instrument by which he released and quitclaimed to defendant land on which he had only a school-land certificate of purchase, and by which he further agreed to perfect his title, and make defendant a good deed. Held, that the instrument was a quitclaim deed, and conveyed all the grantor's interest, and that the agreement for a subsequent deed was only a covenant of further assurance.

2. In such case the subsequent issue of a patent to the grantor inures to defendant's benefit, and invests him with the legal title.

James F. Faraher, for appellant. H. B. Warren, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Ejectment; judgment for defendant; plaintiff appeals. Both parties claim through one Whitmire. In 1860, Whitmire, who then had only a school-land certificate of purchase, upon which 20 per cent. of the price had been paid, executed to one Coats an instrument, which is considered below, and Coats subsequently conveyed to the defendant. In 1878 the state issued a patent to Whitmire, who in 1884 made a deed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's position is that, prior to the issuance of the patent, Whitmire had merely an interest which, while regarded as the legal title as against third persons, was not so regarded as against the state; that the legal title remained in the state until the issuance of the patent in 1878; that the instrument executed to Coats in 1860 was not a present conveyance, but only an agreement for a deed, and therefore did not pass the after-acquired title or any title; that, after receiving the legal title, Whitmire did not convey it to the defendant, but conveyed it to the plaintiff; and that, since the plaintiff has the legal title, he must prevail in ejectment. From this it is obvious that it is necessary to consider the effect of the instrument executed by Whitmire to Coats. The heading of this document in the transcript is "Agreement for a Deed." But it does not appear that the instrument itself was so called. It seems to be a mere characterization by the person who made the record on appeal. But, even if it were indorsed upon the document itself, it is clearly not a part of the instrument, and consequently would not affect its character. The material portions of the instrument are as follows: "This agreement, made and entered into this first day of November, 1860, by and between T. S. Whitmire of Shasta Valley, in the county of Siskiyou, state of California, the party of the first part, and Silas D. Coats of the same place, the party of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to him in hand paid by the said party of the second part, hath and hereby doth release and forever quitclaim unto the said party of the second part, and to his heirs and assigns and legal representatives, all that certain piece and parcel of land," (describing it.) If there were nothing else in the instrument, we think it clear that it would amount to a quitclaim deed. The operative words of such a deed are ordinarily "remit, release, and quitclaim;" but the omission of the first word is not material. The words "release and forever quitclaim" are sufficient. And it is settled that a quitclaim deed conveys whatever title the grantor has. Lawrence v. Ballou, 37 Cal. 518; Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 254, 3 Pac. Rep. 867. The appellant contends, however, that the effect of the instrument as a conveyance in present is destroyed by the following clause, viz.: "To have and to hold the same forever, subject to the following covenants, conditions, and agreements, to-wit: The said party of the first part, for himself, his heirs, and legal representatives, agrees to and with the said party of the second part, his heirs and legal representatives, to proceed and perfect his title to said granted section, which he has now commenced under the school laws of California, as fast as said laws shall or may require until his title thus commenced shall become perfect to an inheritance and unincumbered freehold therein; and upon the acquisition of said estate in said lands the party of the first part, for himself, his heirs and legal representatives, covenants and agrees to and with the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns and legal representatives, to make out, sign, seal, execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the said party of the second part, his heirs, assigns, and legal representatives, a good and sufficient deed conveying said estate of inheritance free of incumbrance to so much of said quarter section above described, to the said party of the second part, his heirs, assigns, and legal representatives, the same to become operative upon the said party of the second part or his legal representatives paying or causing to be paid to the said party of the first part, or his legal representatives, within ten days thereafter, the sum of one hundred dollars." This, we think, is a covenant of further assurance, and does not impair the words of conveyance first quoted. The instrument was therefore a quitclaim deed, and operated as a present transfer of whatever interest the grantor then had. It is true that he did not then have the legal title as against the state, and that he did not make a deed to Coats or his grantee, after obtaining the patent, as his covenant bound him to do. But if his deed operated to pass the after-acquired title, no further assurance was necessary; and we think it so operated. As a general rule, a quitclaim deed does not have this effect. But it must be held to have this effect in this case, upon the authority of Stanway v. Rubio, 51 Cal. 41, which proceeds upon the ground that the title transferred by the patent relates back to the institution of the proceedings to acquire the government title, and subsequently inures to the benefit of the person to whom the holder of the certificate of purchase conveyed. If the plaintiff has any equitable rights he cannot maintain them upon a simple complaint in ejectment. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

TRESPASS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. Plaintiffs were in possession as lessees of a building which they used as a barber-shop, when, by reason of defendants' trespass, the building was rendered unfit for such purpose, and they were compelled to move, losing thereby a hot-water privilege which they had purchased. Held, that they were entitled to damages for loss of the water privilege, the value of permanent improvements abandoned, expense of removal, and loss in their business, under Civil Code Cal. § 3333, which gives the right to recover the amount that will compensate for the detriment "proximately caused" by the trespass.

2. In such case, an instruction that plaintiffs are entitled to such an amount as will compensate them for "all loss and harm" suffered by reason of their enforced removal, taking into consideration the length of time of the lease, and the time it had been enjoyed, and the value of such advantages as were a part of it, or grew out of their interest in it, is not erroneous as not confining the recovery to damages proximately caused by the trespass.

3. To show the loss in plaintiffs' business by such enforced removal it is competent to show the amount of business done before and after the trespass.

4. Where it appears that an amended complaint was not obnoxious to a demurrer sought to be interposed, defendants cannot complain because the court, after overruling a demurrer to the original complaint, instead of allowing another demurrer to the whole complaint as amended, limited it to the amendment.

5. After an answer has been filed to an original complaint it is not an abuse of the court's discretion to confine a second answer to amendments to the complaint, if there is no difference between the answers except with reference to the amendment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Stephen M. White, for appellants. J. O. Kœpff, Baker & Long, and Will D. Gould, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover damages for trespass alleged to have been committed by the defendants in "breaking and entering" upon the premises held, used, and possessed by the plaintiffs under a lease, and "forcibly and unlawfully altering and changing the construction" of the premises "by lowering a portion of the ceiling" thereof, "and by closing up and obstructing the windows and gratings thereof, through which plaintiffs obtained light and air for their said premises." It was further alleged that these acts of the defendants rendered the premises "totally unfit and useless" for the purposes of their business, which was that of carrying on a barber-shop and bath-room; that they were thereby compelled to vacate the premises, and did vacate them, under this compulsion, on the 3d day of September, 1888, the lease not expiring until the 26th of April, 1891. The damages claimed were from the loss of the established trade and business of the plaintiffs; from that occasioned by having to abandon a portion of the permanent improvements which they had made on the leased premises; from that resulting from the plaintiffs being compelled to abandon and lose the benefit of their leasehold interest; from that which they suffered by being deprived of the benefit of their agreement with a party who allowed them a hot-water privilege for the use of their barber-shop and bath-room; and by reason of expenses entailed on them in their enforced removal from the premises. The plaintiffs obtained judgment for $500, a very much less sum than they claimed. From that, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The evidence certainly tended to show that the plaintiffs occupied and used the premises as they claimed, and that the trespass was committed by the duly-authorized agent of the defendant Siegel. The main argument of the defendant seems to be on the alleged erroneous ruling of the court as to the measure of damages recoverable in the action, in the admission of evidence, and in the instructions upon the matter which it gave, refused, or modified. In this connection the defendant urges that no damages could be recovered by the plaintiffs for the loss of the hot-water privileges, which they derived from the agreement with E. Durham, mentioned in the eighth paragraph of the complaint. If, as we think, the evidence tended to show that the plaintiffs were compelled to abandon their place of business by the trespass of the defendant, then they were entitled to recover whatever "amount will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated or not." Civil Code, § 3333. If the evidence tended to show any detriment suffered by the plaintiffs in losing this hot-water privilege, and the loss thereof was proximately caused by the trespass complained of, the plaintiffs were entitled to be compensated therefor, and it was for the jury, under all the evidence, to say if they were entitled to any compensation, and, if so, how much. The evidence did show that the plaintiffs had such a privilege, and that they paid a certain amount of money therefor, and that it was of beneficial use to them. There is also evidence which tends to show that the cause of their leaving the premises was that the trespass complained of made their place of business unfit for the purposes for which they had leased, occupied, and possessed it. The trespass caused them to abandon the water privilege. The loss of the water privilege was one of the injuries resulting from this abandonment. This injury, then, was proximately caused by the trespass, and the plaintiffs were to be compensated therefor. We perceive no error in the eighth instruction given, nor in the evidence offered and admitted in support of the demand.

It is further urged in behalf of the appellants' contention that the instruction given by the court is at variance with section 3333 of the Civil Code, and misleading, in that it permits and directs the jury to take into consideration anything, however remote, which might appear to them to indicate "loss or harm." The instruction reads as follows: "(9) The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs had a leasehold interest in the premises in question, and that by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant said leasehold interest was rendered wholly or in part worthless to the plaintiffs, or that they were compelled to abandon the same, then the plaintiffs are entitled to such an amount as will compensate them for all loss or harm suffered thereby, taking into consideration the length of time of said lease and the length of time it had been enjoyed by the plaintiffs, and the value of such advantages as they may be satisfied by the evidence were a part of or directly grew out of said leasehold interest, but not including in this item anything for loss of hot-water rights or established trade and business." Fairly considered, this instruction announces to the jury that the damages recoverable by the plaintiffs for any loss suffered by them which rendered their leasehold interest wholly or in part worthless, occasioned by the wrongful acts of the defendant, must be measured by the whole duration of said lease under the terms thereof, and the length of time it had been enjoyed by them, up to the time of the reception of the injury, and by the value of such advantages as accrued to them under the lease, which grew directly out of their interest therein, but not to include anything which resulted from the loss of hot-water rights or established trade or business, and that these damages must be in such an amount as will compensate them for any such loss. This did not, in our judgment, direct the jury to give damages in their nature remote or speculative, but was confined to a verdict for such detriment only as was proximately caused by the wrongful acts of the defendant as affecting loss from the injury done alone to the leasehold interest held by the plaintiffs; and although, perhaps, the instruction is not so perspicuous and clear as it might have been, we see nothing in it misleading or conflicting with other instructions, which last most clearly kept before the jury the idea that they were to give no damages except such as were the proximate result of the injury done. And this will appear by a glance at the other instructions given.

It is further claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that in estimating the damages done the plaintiffs they might consider the evidence concerning the expenses of the enforced removal of the plaintiffs from the premises to another place of business, and that regarding any damage which might result from the deprivation of the use of improvements abandoned by them. The defendant contends that these elements of damage were not recoverable. The argument in this connection appears to be that the plaintiffs could only recover for the benefits which they might have had if the defendants had permitted them to remain at their former place of business untrampled upon. But the plaintiffs were not, according to the tendency of their evidence, permitted to remain unmolested, but were driven away by the wrongful acts of the defendants. Hence the former were entitled to recover whatever their loss might be of which the defendants' wrongful acts were the efficient cause. "The proximate cause is the efficient cause,—the one that necessarily sets the other causes in operation." Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 130. "That which is the actual cause of the loss, whether operating directly, or by putting intervening agencies, the operation of which could not be reasonably avoided, in motion, by which the loss is produced, is the cause to which such loss should be attributed." Brady v. Insurance Co., 11 Mich. 425. Here the evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs tended to show that the trespass of the defendant, and his acts in accomplishing it, resulted in the plaintiffs having to leave their place of business, give up their leasehold interest, go to expense in moving their appurtenances, etc., lose the privilege which they had of hot water for baths and barber-shop, and in their having to go to another place of business less favorable or profitable, which entailed loss in their established trade and business, and having to lose the use of abandoned permanent improvements. The cause which sets all the rest in motion was the trespass; the operation of the subsequent agencies of loss were the result of this wrongful injury. Hence they proximately resulted from that trespass. To the first cause primarily all the damages resulting are to be attributed, although each item of damage was produced by some separate cause following the primary cause, and operating more immediately in producing the damages. Insurance Co. v. Boon, supra, citing Insurance Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44. Damages which accrue subsequent to the tort, but of which it is the primary cause, are not separate causes of action, but "are parts of the tort itself for which the cause of action is given." Wood v. Currey, 57 Cal. 210. No error is perceived in the rulings of the trial court as to the instructions just mentioned, or as to the evidence admitted on the points involved therein.

Further complaint is made because the trial court allowed a question to be put to one of the plaintiffs, as follows: "What is that leasehold worth to you?" If erroneous because it did not seek for the market value of that interest, it was harmless in view of the answer of the witness, which plainly indicated that the value of which he testified was the market value. The appellant contends that the court erred in allowing evidence to go to the jury as to the amount of business done by the plaintiffs before and after the alleged trespass. The complaint charged as one of the elements of damage resulting from the trespass that the plaintiffs had lost thereby their established trade and business. With a view to show what that loss was we think the evidence was admissible. "The best-considered cases agree that where an established business is wrongfully injured or destroyed, the owner of the business can recover the damages sustained thereby, and that upon this ques-

The point is made that the defendant should have been allowed to demur to the amended complaint, and to file an answer thereto. While the trial was in progress, the plaintiffs asked leave to amend the fifth paragraph of their complaint. The request was granted. The amendment was made, and a copy of it served and filed. A recess was then taken by the court to allow the defendant to plead thereto. Upon the reassembling of the court the defendant presented, filed, and read a demurrer, which went to other matters besides the amendment filed by the plaintiffs. Previous to this the defendant had demurred generally to the complaint, before amendment, which was overruled for want of "presentation." We suppose this was intended to read "prosecution." The court refused to consider the demurrer to the amended complaint, except as directed to the amendment allowed to be made, and as to that overruled the demurrer. The defendant then asked leave to file an answer to the whole complaint as amended. This the court refused to allow, upon the ground that the only portion of the complaint which had been amended was the fifth paragraph thereof, and that the defendant might file an answer to that. Maintaining his right to answer the whole complaint and reserving his exception, the defendant answered the fifth paragraph of the complaint. It is true that "the amendment, together with the original amended complaint, constituted a new complaint, which superseded all other pleadings in the case." Thompson v. Johnson, 60 Cal. 295. But no reason is shown why the demurrer as filed should have been sustained on any of the grounds alleged therein, nor do we perceive that the amended complaint was obnoxious to that demurrer. The defendant was in no worse condition by the refusal of the court to consider anything but the demurrer as applicable to the amendment made to the complaint than he would have been had the court considered and overruled the demurrer as a whole.

As to the action of the court in refusing to allow the filing of an amended answer except to that portion of the complaint which had not been already answered, it does not appear that the answer proposed to be filed differed in any essential respect from the answer on file except with reference to that part answering the amendment of the fifth paragraph of the complaint; and that portion of the proposed answer was filed and considered. In the action of the court, therefore, as to these matters, there appears no abuse of discretion. Perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—JUDGMENT—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Defendant, who was charged with burglary and with a former conviction of grand larceny, both of which charges he denied by his plea, and against whom was rendered a verdict for burglary only, may be sentenced to imprisonment for both offenses, where, on the day of the trial, he withdrew his denial of the conviction of larceny.

2. Though the time fixed for pronouncing judgment was not at least two days after the verdict, as required by Pen. Code Cal. § 1191, defendant's failure to object to such time will be deemed an assent thereto, he having a right to waive the time allowed to elapse by the provisions of the Code.

3. Where the charge was not given in writing, it will be presumed, on appeal, unless the contrary is shown, that it was taken down by the phonographic reporter, as required by Pen. Code Cal. § 1093, subd. 6.

4. Where the information charges that the offense was committed in "the city and county of San Francisco," the place where it was committed need not be repeated in the judgment.

5. A judgment by which it is "ordered, adjudged, and decreed" that defendant be imprisoned, is sufficient in form.

Commissioners' decision. Department

2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFTEER, Judge.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the people.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was charged in the information filed against him with the crime of burglary, and with a prior conviction of grand larceny. He was tried and found guilty of burglary in the second degree. Judgment was entered that he be imprisoned in the state prison for the term of 10 years. From this judgment he has appealed, but the record brought up contains no bill of exceptions and none of the instructions given to the jury. In support of the appeal it is argued that the defendant, as shown by the record, was arraigned only for the crime of burglary, and pleaded simply not guilty; that this plea put in issue every allegation of the information, and upon it he was tried and found guilty simply of burglary in the second degree; that, as there was no verdict as to the prior conviction, it could not be taken into consideration in pronouncing judgment, and hence, as the maximum term of imprisonment authorized by the statute in such a case was five years, (Penal Code, § 461,) the judgment was illegal, and should be reversed. It is true that the record as originally filed in this court showed no admission by the defendant or finding as to the alleged prior conviction, but, on suggestion of a diminution of the record, an amendment duly certified was subsequently filed, showing that after the appeal was taken the trial court amended its record of the case nunc pro tunc, so as to show that on the day of the trial the defendant admitted the prior conviction set forth in the information, and withdrew his former denial thereof. The record, therefore, as now presented, does not support the argument. The defendant clearly had the right at any time to withdraw his plea of not guilty to the charge of prior conviction, and to confess the same, and, having done so, the jury had nothing to say or find in regard to it. The verdict covered the only issue submitted to the jury, and upon it the court was authorized to affix the penalty, as it did, at 10 years' imprisonment. Pen. Code, § 666; People v. Brooks, 65 Cal. 300, 4 Pac. Rep. 11. It is also argued that the record affirmatively shows error, because it appears therefrom that the verdict was rendered on January 15, 1890, and the court thereupon appointed January 17th as the time for pronouncing judgment, and on the last-named day pronounced the judgment appealed from. It is said that, under section 1191 of the Penal Code, the time fixed for pronouncing judgment in cases of felony must be at least two days after the verdict, and that the minutes show that two full days could not have intervened. A sufficient answer to this point is that one found guilty of a felony may waive the time which the Code says must elapse between the verdict and sentence, and may consent that judgment be pronounced immediately. People v. Robinson, 46 Cal. 94. Here it does not appear that the defendant ever made any objection in the court below on account of this alleged shortness of time, and he must therefore be held to have assented to it. In People v. Mess, 65 Cal. 174, 3 Pac. Rep. 670, the same point was made, and, as we think, correctly held untenable. It is further said that the record shows affirmatively that an oral charge was given by the court to the jury, and that this was an error, calling for a reversal of the judgment. But the giving of an oral charge is not necessarily error. The statute says: "The judge may then charge the jury, and must do so on any points pertinent to the issue, if requested by either party; and he may state the testimony and declare the law. If the charge be not given in writing, it must be taken down by the phonographic reporter." Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 6. Here it does not appear that the charge complained of was not given at the request of the defendant, nor that it was not taken down by the phonographic reporter. It will be presumed, therefore, that it was so taken down. The well-settled rule is that error is not to be inferred, but must affirmatively appear in the record. People v. Huff, 72 Cal. 117, 13 Pac. Rep. 168; People v. Leong Sing, 77 Cal. 117, 19 Pac. Rep. 254; People v. Cline, 83 Cal. 374, 23 Pac. Rep. 391.

Another point made for reversal is that the judgment was illegally pronounced, for the reason that the defendant was not informed by the court, or under its direction, of the nature of the charge against him, or of his plea or of the verdict. And it is said, under this head, that the minutes do not show that the judgment was pronounced in open court, or by any judge of the court, and that it cannot be seen therefrom whether there was any judge present, or whether the court had been or was opened. These objections are sufficiently met and answered by the recitals in the judgment itself, as shown by the certified copy thereof in the record, which was sufficient to show that the judgment was pronounced in open court, and by the judge thereof, and to meet the requirements of sections 1200 and 1207 of the Penal Code.

It is further said that the judgment fails to show that it was pronounced for any crime committed within the jurisdiction of the court, and that it simply orders that defendant be punished by imprisonment, but does not direct that he be imprisoned, and hence is not such a judgment as is contemplated in criminal practice. There is nothing in these objections. The information charged that the offense was committed in the city and county of San Francisco, and it was not necessary that the judgment should state where it was committed. It was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed" that the defendant be punished by imprisonment in the state prison, and this was all that is necessary. We find no material error in the record, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PEOPLE v. BARTON. (No. 20,712.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Though, on a conviction for burglary, the time appointed for pronouncing judgment was not at least two days after verdict, as required by Pen. Code Cal. § 1191, this is no ground for reversal where defendant made no objection at the trial.

2. Where the charge to the jury in a prosecution for felony was given orally, it will be presumed on appeal, in the absence of a contrary showing, that it was taken down by the phonographic reporter, as required by Pen. Code Cal. § 1093, subd. 6.

3. Though the judgment roll does not show that when judgment was pronounced defendant was informed by the court of the nature of the charge against him, of his plea, and of the verdict, conceding that these statements are required by Pen. Code Cal. § 1200, it will be presumed on appeal that they were made, when the contrary is not shown.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFTER, Judge.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was convicted by the jury which tried him of burglary in the first degree. He pleaded not guilty as to that charge, but admitted prior conviction of grand larceny, as charged in the information. The notice of appeal states that the appeal is taken from the judgment, from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. But it nowhere appears that any such motions were ever made or acted upon. There is no bill of exceptions in the record. The first point made for a reversal of the judgment is that the time appointed for pronouncing it was not at least two days after verdict, and is therefore in violation of section 1191 of the Penal Code. The defendant seems to have made no objection at any time to this action of the trial court, and under the decision of the appellate court in People v. Mess, 65 Cal. 174, 3 Pac. Rep. 670, the point made is without merit. It is further claimed that, the offense being a felony, error is shown upon the minutes of the court, in that it is there stated that the charge to the jury was given orally. It is true that subdivision 6, § 1093, of the Penal Code requires that, where the charge in such a case is not given in writing, it must be taken down by the phonographic reporter. But it is not made to appear here that it was not so taken down, and the presumption must be that it was. The defendant must show error affirmatively. People v. Tonielli, 81 Cal. 279, 22 Pac. Rep. 678; People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 153, 22 Pac. Rep. 129; People v. Marks, 72 Cal. 46, 13 Pac. Rep. 149; People v. Huff, 72 Cal. 117, 13 Pac. Rep. 168; People v. Leong Sing, 77 Cal. 119, 19 Pac. Rep. 254; People v. Cline, 83 Cal. 377, 23 Pac. Rep. 391. It is said that the judgment was illegally pronounced, because it does not appear from the judgment roll that the defendant was informed, as he should have been, under section 1200, Penal Code, by the court, or under its direction, of the nature of the charge against him, or of his plea, or of the verdict. Conceding that it appears to have been held in People v. Murback, 64 Cal. 372, that these preliminary statements are necessary, and that they form no part of the judgment pronounced, yet it does not appear in the record that such statements were not made; and the presumption must be indulged that they were, unless the appellant has shown to the contrary, which he has not done. The prior conviction of larceny was confessed by the defendant. The jury then passed only upon the charge of burglary. "The judgment follows the verdict and confession of the defendant, and is in all respects regular," as we think. Ex parte Young Ah Gow, 73 Cal. 442, 15 Pac. Rep. 76. The admission of prior conviction of larceny here is not shown to have been brought out by any question of the court, but appears, so far as the record shows, to have been voluntarily made when the defendant was called on to plead. As before said, it is for the appellant who claims error to show it. We perceive no prejudicial error, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

CONVICTS—ESCAPE—COMMENCEMENT OF TERM.

Petitioner was sentenced to the state-prison for a term of nine years for grand larceny, and also for a term of five years for burglary, the latter term to begin at the expiration of the former. He escaped from prison during the first term, and on recapture was sentenced to serve a term of nine years for such escape, under Pen. Code Cal. § 105. That section provides that the term of imprisonment for the escape shall "commence from the time the prisoner would have otherwise been discharged from the prison." Held, that it did not commence until petitioner had served out both the former terms, less whatever credits he may have earned.

Carroll Cook, for petitioner. W. H. B. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner was convicted in the superior court of Sonoma county of the crime of grand larceny, and on the same day, and before sentence was pronounced in the first case, was convicted of the crime of burglary. He was sentenced by the court to serve a term of nine years in the state-prison in the grand larceny case, and in the burglary case the court imposed the sentence of five years in the state-prison, said term to commence at the expiration of the term of nine years imposed in the grand larceny case. His first term of imprisonment commenced on the 21st day of October, 1879, and he remained in the state-prison until August 21, 1880, when he escaped therefrom. He was captured, and again confined under the first judgment on the 9th day of November, 1880. Thereafter an information was filed against him in the superior court of Marin county for the crime of escaping from prison, and he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to serve a term of nine years, "said term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would otherwise have been discharged from said prison." Allowing the credits provided for by statute, the petitioner's first term expired not later than December 9, 1884, and if the term of imprisonment for escaping from the prison commenced to run at the expiration of the term which he was serving when he escaped, all of the terms of imprisonment imposed by the three judgments—allowing the credits provided for by statute, all of which it is admitted he has earned—have expired, and the petitioner is entitled to his discharge. Section 105 of the Penal Code provides that "every prisoner confined in the state-prison for a term less than for life, who escapes therefrom, is punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison for a term equal in length to the term he was serving at the time of such escape; said second term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would have otherwise been discharged from said prison." The last clause of this section was added by amendment of the section in April, 1880, and plainly states that the term of imprisonment for an escape from the prison shall commence to run from the time that the prisoner would have been discharged from the prison if he had not escaped therefrom. The petitioner's term of imprisonment from the escape did not commence to run until he had served the 14 years imposed by the two judgments of the superior court, less credits allowed, because, except for his escape, he would not have been discharged from the prison until he had served out the full term imposed by the two judgments. The language of the section is unambiguous, and its meaning is clear. Petition denied.

EQUITABLE DEFENSES—TRIAL BY COURT—WAIVER.

1. In an action for the recovery of possession of personal property, an answer claiming that defendant is the owner of the property, and further setting up a counter-claim for damages for conspiracy and deceit, presents no equitable defense justifying the court in proceeding to try it in advance of a trial of the issues at law.

2. After the court had denied defendant's written application for a jury trial, failure to repeat the application did not waive defendant's right to such trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

John F. Burris and Jos. M. Kinley, for appellant. C. K. Royce, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The complaint herein is in the ordinary form of an action for the recovery of the possession of certain personal property. When the cause came on for trial the appellant demanded a jury, and her application was denied by the court, "on the ground that the defense set up was an equitable defense, and should be tried by the court in the first instance." The correctness of this ruling is the principal error presented on this appeal.

It has been stated by this court in many cases that when the defendant interposes equitable and legal defenses to the complaint the proper rule of procedure for the court is to hear and dispose of the equitable defense before proceeding to try the issues of law. Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 160; Estrada v. Murphy, 19 Cal. 273; Weber v. Marshall, Id. 457; Lestrade v. Barth, Id. 671; Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 319; Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 434, 12 Pac. Rep. 454. By making an equitable defense in such an action the defendant does not, however, lose any right which he would otherwise have to have the issues of law tried by a jury; nor does the court, by virtue of being called upon under the above rule to first hear and dispose of the equitable defense, acquire the right to pass upon all the issues in the case without a jury. It may happen in many cases that the result of the trial of the equitable defense will obviate the necessity of a trial of the legal issues. The trial may dispose of all of the issues in the case, or the equitable relief granted may be such as to prevent the trial of the issues at law, as was the case in Bodley v. Ferguson, 30 Cal. 512. But whenever the trial of the equitable defense does not have such result, and the issues at law remain undisposed of, these issues are to be tried in the same manner as if no equitable defense had been interposed. In Arguello v. Edinger, supra, the court says: "If upon hearing the evidence the court should determine there was ground for relief, it would enjoin the further prosecution of the action with its decree for a specific performance; and, on the other hand, if it should refuse the relief, it would call a jury to determine the issues upon the general denial." In Weber v. Marshall, supra, the court says: "The parties are entitled to a trial by jury upon the legal issues." In Lestrade v. Barth, supra, it is said: "The equitable defense should, therefore, be first passed on by the court, as according to the determination of the claim of the defendant to the relief he seeks will the necessity of proceeding with the action at law depend." In Martin v. Zellerbach, supra, the court says: "The more regular and orderly practice in such cases clearly is first to dispose of the equitable defenses set up in the answer. If these are found for the defendant it will obviate in most cases the necessity of trying the law side of the action, but, if found against the defendant, he still has the right to be heard on his other defenses." It has never been held, however, that every defense of an equitable nature that may be interposed to an action at law must be heard and determined by the court before proceeding to try the issues at law. Such a rule of practice would, in many instances, be inconvenient, and would tend to embarrass, rather than facilitate, the trial of the cause. The cases in which the rule has been laid down were cases in ejectment, in which the defendant asserted such a controlling equity as, if ripened into a decree, would prevent the plaintiff from asserting his legal claim. The equitable defense which is referred to in the rule is properly an equitable right of action existing in behalf of the defendant, which he might have asserted in an independent suit brought by him against the plaintiff for the purpose of enforcing such right, but which, under our system, he can also rely upon as a defense in an action involving the same subject-matter brought against him by the plaintiff. The party relying upon such equitable defense must, however, plead it with the same fullness and particularity as is required in cases involving like subjects of inquiry in suits in equity. His answer, being the in the nature of a bill in equity, must contain all the essential averments of such a bill. He then becomes an actor with respect to the matters alleged by him, and his defense must be of such a character as may be ripened into a decree in his favor. Estrada v. Murphy, 19 Cal. 273; Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 39; Carpentier v. Oakland, 30 Cal. 443; Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 352. It is very clear upon an inspection of the answer in the present case that there was no equitable defense presented thereby which, within the foregoing principles, authorized the court to insist that it should be "tried by the court in the first instance," or that would justify the court in proceeding to try it in advance of a trial of the issues at law. Not only do the facts alleged fail to show such equitable defense, but it is with much force urged that the only issues presented by the answer are the title of the plaintiff to the property sued for, and its value. In the first portion of the answer the facts alleged present no other issue than the claim of the defendant that she was herself the owner of the property, which is only an other mode of denying the plaintiff's title. Thompson v. Thompson, 52 Cal. 154. The "separate and distinct answer" which the appellant sets up under the head of "second count" is more in the nature of a counter-claim for damages arising from an alleged conspiracy and deceit practiced towards her by the plaintiff in connection with others. It further appears from the record that after the court had made the above ruling the appellant's attorney stated to it that he had no evidence to offer in support of the answer, excepting upon the question of the value of the property; and thereupon the court proceeded to the trial of the issues presented by the complaint. It was urged at the argument that, as the appellant did not, after such ruling, again demand a jury, she is now precluded from making an objection to the action of the court. But it was not necessary that she should make any demand for a jury. This was secured to her by the provisions of section 592, Code Civil Proc., unless a jury trial should be waived by her in one of the modes prescribed in section 631, 1d. Not only did she did not waive it in any of these modes, but she had filed a written demand for a jury, and this must be held to be a continued refusal to waive her right thereto. After the court had once denied her application it was not necessary for her to repeat the demand. The action of the court thereafter in proceeding to try the cause without a jury was under her exception. In view of what is stated above, this ruling of the court was erroneous, and for this error its judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed; and it is so ordered.
